PREFACE.

The publication in 1883 of Mr. Rutherford's Babrius determined the present edition of Aziamus. The Elegiac version, if not equal to its Greek original, is sufficiently good as a specimen of Latin in the fourth and fifth centuries A.D. to deserve a revived study ${ }^{1}$. For me the work had a special attraction. Not only is it contained in good and early MISS, but in many of these IISS it follows or precedes the Elegies of Maximianus, which had engaged my attention as far back as 1878 (when I collated the Eton MS of Maximianus), and on which I have since written two articles printed in the American Journal of Philology (vol. v. I-r 5, $145-163$ ). As is there observed, the two works, the Fables of Avianus and the Elegies of Maximianus, seem to have been studied together in the Middle Age. To both of them I feel grateful for leading me for a time away from the beaten paths of philology to the comparatively neglected literature of the Decline, to the History of Ammianus IIarcellinus, the Epistles of Apollinaris Sidonius, the poems of Ausonius, Claudian, Rutilius Namatianus, as well as of Prudentius and Orientius: in a word to that cycle of writers to whom Prof. E. A. Freeman has recently called (and not, I trust, vainly) our attention. It is indeed impossible to believe that an Age of Research like ours will content itself with the amount of illustration which these authors have received from the editors of the past. No adequate edition of Ammianus exists ; Savaron's edition of Sidonius, published in $I_{599}$, is still the only one which can be recommended. New commentaries on Symmachus, Ausonius, Claudian, Rutilius, are loudly called for, all the more that the Germans, while exhausting their energies in publishing new texts, are almost indifferent to the equally important task of comment and elucidation.

On Avianus the only existing Commentary is that of Cannegieter, published in 1731 . Judged by modern standards, Cannegieter performed his task only tolerably well. His notes are cumbrous and loaded with useless citations, as well as unnecessary or improbable con-

[^0]jectures. He was also guilty of the serious mistake of habitually illustrating Avianus (whom he pre-dated by at least two centuries) from writers of the Ciceronian or Augustan age. I have taken warning from his example, and have made my commentary as illustrative as I could of the later literature to which the Fables undoubtedly belong. It is something merely to recall to the reader's mind the existence of an historian as great as Ammianus or a poet as finished as Merobaudes.

I must record my obligations to the librarians of the Bibliothèque Nationale at Paris, of the public library of Trèves, and of S. Peter's College, Cambridge, for the loan of valuable and early MSS of the Fables. Also to the distinguished archacologist, MI. Wiilhelm Fröhner, for the free use which he allowed me to make of his collation of the two Paris MSS $A$ and $P$, as well as of the Carlsruhe fragment ( $K$ ). I have not availed myself of his generous permission to reprint the Latin Paraphrast, thinking it better to refer the reader to Fröhner's own edition (Teubner, 1862). For the Index of words I am indebted to my friend Mr. Charles Bradburne of Trinity College.

THE AGE OF AVIANUS.

At what period were the forty-two fables of Avianus written? Do tiey belong to the age of the Intonines as Cannegieter and Lachmann lu th thought, or are they the product of a much later time, the fourth, fifth, or even sixth century of the Christian era?

It is only within the last forty years that any adequate answer could be given to this question. It was not till 1844 that the Greek scazons of Babrius, the original which Avianus paraphrased. became known to the philological world; and no really critical edition of the text of Avianus had been published till $\mathbf{1 8 6 2}$, when the eminent archaeologist and swant, Wilhelm Fröhner, exhibited for the first time the readings of the three earliest MSS in the National Library of Paris. Lately our data for forming an opinion have been largely augmented by the MSS which Bährens collated for his edition (Poet. Latin. Minor. v. pp. $31-70$ ), to which I may now add my own four, $B O R X$.

It is unlucky that the earlier of the two Leyden MSS (Bährens' $V$ of the ninth century) does not give the poet's name either at the beginning or end. But in $C$, perhaps the hest of Fröhner's Paris MSS, and hardyy later than the tenth century in O.a Bodleian codex of the eleventh century, in the Galeanus of the same date in the library of Trinity Coland $R$, belonging respectively whe I auremian I ibrary at Floreme and to the Vatican, lastly in two MSS exhibited by me for the first time ( $B$ and $X$ ), the name is given uniformly (in the genitive) Atriani. I know of only one early MS in which it appears as Avieni-my Bodleian $R$ (xi-xil century), which ends with the words, Expliciunt fabule autieni poete aegregii.

To come to external authorities. It is remarkable that the fables of Avianus are never quoted by any of the grammatical or metrical writers included in the first six volumes of Keil's edition ${ }^{1}$. It is only

[^1]in the later treatise celited by ITagen in his Anecdota ITeluetica (rol. vii of Keil's Gramm. Lat.) that they appear, pp. $174,182,185$. In the first of these passages ix. 19 is cited from Avienius; in the latter two, vii. 8, ix. 19, are quoted each with the introductory illud Aumeni. I have myedf found one citation from them in the welfth century Phillipps Glossary (4626) s.v. Citisus (see on XXVI. 5) where the author is called in the nominative Avianus.

This exceptional Avienius or Avienus of the grammatical treatise edited by Hagen from cod. Bern. 83 ought not to be lightly dismissed. Hagen believed that treatise to be written 'intra saeculorum noni decimique fines,' and its author was obviously a man of learning. It may be assumed, therefore, that he found in a MIS probably earlier than any now extant, Fabulae Auiemi or Auienii. This agrees, not only with the heading Auienus Theodosio affixed to the Praefatio, as copied in cod. Vindob. 326 I (Endlicher cccvi) from an early source (Schenkl Zeitsch. f. Österreich. Gymn. xvi. p. 400, Ausonius p. xxxiv), with the Prologus Auieni incipit of Paris 8093 f. $94^{\text {b }}$ where the Preface as far as coartauit is written by itself, and with my own Bodleian MS $R$, but with the additional name Festi in the Bodl. codex $O$. Festus is well known as one of the names of the poet Rufius Festus Avienus, the translator of Aratus, and author of two geographical poems, the Descriptio Orbis Terrae, a version in Latin hexameters of the חeping $\begin{aligned} \text { ors }\end{aligned}$ of Dionysius, and the Orae Maritimae liber I in Latin iambics. The ascription of the Fables to him, common in modern times, was no doubt started in antiquity. $O$ retains part of this ascription, but otherwise follows the prevailing spelling of the name, Avianus.

A comparison of the Index to Mommsen's Corpus Inscriptionum Regni Neapolitani ( $C I R N$ ) with that of the C. I. Africae shows that Avianius, Aviania are far commoner than Avianus, Aviana, or Avienus. In the CIRN there are nine Avianii for one Avianus, three Avianiae for one Aviana; Avienus is only recorded once. In the C. I. A. there are ten Avianii, four Avianiae, for one Aviana, one Avien(us). Hence there is some plausibility in Fröhner's conjecture (Kritische Analekten, p. 6o) that the writer of the Fables was really not Avianus, but Avianius. The latter name occurs as early as Inscript. 577 in the volume of Republican Inscriptions, C. I. L. I $M$. $A u i-$ anius M. F. Coniunctus: four Avianii Flacci are mentioned in Orelli's Onomasticon as among the friends of Cicero, one of whom, the C. Avianius of Acad. ii. 25. 80, was long written Avianus, and has only recently been restored to his rights by the sagacity of Bergk and the evidence of the best MSS. In the fourth century of the Christian era the name became famous as borne by L. Avianius Symmachus, inter praecipua nominandus exempla doctrinarum atque modestiae Amm. xxvii. 3. 3, father of the illustrious orator and epistolographer Q. Aurelius Symmachus: see Seeck's ed. of Symmachus, pp. xli sqq. Four epigrams, each of six lines, are extant by Avianius Symmachus in the collection of his son's Epistles (i. 2) : they are dry, with no charm of style or diction, and exhibit defects of metre, of which there is no trace in our Auiani Fabulae.

If, however, the name was Avianius or Avienius, it seems unlikely that all trace of the genitive in - $i i$ would have disappeared from the MSS of the Fables, most of which have Aviani, an exceptional few Avieni. The more real question seems to be whether the names Avianus, Avienus were not confused with each other, whether the preponderance of the former name in our MSS is not accidental, or at least not decisive against a plausible ascription of the authorship to an Avienus.

And here, at any rate, we seem to touch a certainty. 'The Oxford MS which I call $O$, adds the praenomen Sextus: an addition which points to a belief that the author of the Fables was identical with the well-known author of the Aratia and Discriptio Orbis Tirrae, Sextus Rufius Avienus.

One and one only of Cannegieter's arguments against this identification is of weight. The style of the Fables is unlike that of the Aratca. The fables, though saturated with Vergilianisms, bear unmistakable traces of a declining feeling of correct Latin : the diction of the Aratea is pure, exalted, and classical. But neither the age of Sextus Avienus (Proconsul of Africa 366, of Achaia 372, Teuffel Hist. Rom. Lit. 413 ), nor the MS data as to the name of the Fabulist, preclude such identification. The real argument against it is the complete distinctness of the simple Aviani, which is the prevailing MS itle of the author of the Fables, from the Rufi Fisti Auicui, u. c., which is the MIS description of the author of the Aratia.

There are, however, two other Avieni to whom the authorship of the Fables may juslifiably be ascribed. The first of these is the young Avienus, who is introduced by Macrobius as one of the interlocutors in the Saturnalia; the second is the pupil and correspondent of Ennodius, Bishop of Pavia.

The claims of the second of these may be discussed first.
Not only was he learned and the son of a learned father (Ennod. Epist. i. 5 Hartel addilur quod in principio uilae disciplinis optimis instilutus uidetur mermisse quod adiptus est. . . naturae in dicus scolas et litterarum studia consecutus, paternae perfictionis acmulator . . . quicquid Altica, quicquid Romana habet praccipuum lingua cognouit, aurum Dimosthenis el firrum Cicironis expendil, utramuqu dicendi siriem Lalinus relator implewit. ix. 32 dommum - Auionum superantem wota reddidimus: habet de origine cius Roma iuctantizm, Liguriar de profichu: ibi domno Fausto filius naturae lige concessus ist, hic irmalitione palifiaclus), but his teacher Emnodius had trained him on the study of Vergil (Ennod. Ep. i. 18 dectormm radix Maro, westri formater eloquii), and illustrates his devotion to his father's example by the fable of the young eagles trained by their parent to look upon the sun (ib.) : two points which might seem to suit the author of our Fables. But (a) whether the Theodosius to whom the fables are inscribed was one of the Roman emperors of that name, or Macrobius Theodosius, the author of the Saturnaliz-in either case the time is earlier by nearly a century than the Avienus in question; (b) in the time of Ennodius sacrifices had long ceased, and the allusions in XXIII. 5, XLII. 8 would be out of date.

Far more is to be said in favour of the other Avienus. In the Saturnalia he is described as a modest and virtuous youth (urrecundia probi adulescentis vi. 7. I, mi Auiene, instituenda est enim adulescentia tua quae ita docilis est ut discenda praecipiat vii. 3.23), and who rarely speaks at much length himself, but keeps the conversation going by questions, interruptions, or whispered objections (Ian, Nacrob. i. p. xxix). Yet so far as his personality is introduced it is well suited to the character of a lover or writer of fables. Thus ii. 4 sqq . he tells a number of wity stories with which his memory supplies him of J. Cacsar, Augustus, and others, to the great delight of the company, who hail with enthusiasm his, 'bricht memory and pleasant wit.' So again in vii. 12.3 he recalls the conversation, which had become too abstruse, to lighter subjects more suited to the entertainment. It will be remembered that a large part of the Saturnalia is taken up with a discussion on Vergil (see Nettleship's full examination, pp. xxxi-lvi in vol. I. of Conington's Vergil) ; and no remnant of Roman literature is more informed with the diction of Vergil than the Fables.

The probability of our hypothesis becomes considerably greater if the Theodosius of the Preface to the Fables is Macrobius Theodosius the author of the Saturnalia. This view was suggested by Pithou (Poemat. Vel. D. 474). and subsecquenty maintained hy Sirmond (Fidtom. p. 4), Gerard John Voss (De Histor. Latinis ii. 9), Colomies (Cimelia Litteraria c. $3^{88}$ ), Wernsdorf (De Carminibus Avieni, P. L. M. v. pp. 669,670 ), Lucian Müller (De Phaedri et Aviani Libellis, p. 32), Bährens (P. L. M. v. p. 31), and Unrein (De Aviani Aetate, p. 60 ).

The elder critics, beginning with Lilius Gyraldus, thought that Avianus addressed his Preface to Theodosius the Great. In doing so they were not without support (I) from the MSS, (2) from parallels in literary history. (1) Two early MSS, Bährens' Reginensis of the eleventh century and my Bodleian $R$, add to the words ad theodosium of the Praefatio the title imperatorm. (2) It was not uncommon to inscribe works to kings or royal personages. Talorius, whone Greek fables were paraphaned hy Avanus, dedicateal his work to an Alexander, probably Alexander Severus (Rutherford, Introduction, p. 1) ; and Vegetius, in offering his Epitoma Rei Mrilitaris to an imperator inuictus (Gibbon Seeck and Lang in his second cdition, though Valentimians 11 ; Bahr Jordan and Langr, first clition, believed Theodosius I), uses words which may be quoted here: Antiquis temporibus mos fuit bonarum artiun studia mandare littcris alque in libros redacta offerre principibus, quia neque recte aliquid inchoatur, nisi post Deum fauerit imperator, neque quemquam magis decet uel metiora scire uel plura quam principen, cuius doctrina omnibus potest prodesse subicctis. Quod Octauianum Augustum ac bonos dehinc principes libenter habuisse frequentibus declaratur excmplis. Sic regnantium testimooniis crebuit cloquentia, dum non culpatur audacia. Hac cgo imitatione conpulsus dum considero clementiam uestram ausibus litterarum magis ignoscere posse quam ceteros, tanto inferiorem me antiquis scriptoribus esse wix sensi, licet in hoc opusculo nee werborum concimnitas sit necessaria nec acumen ingeniu, sed labor diligens ac fidelis.

These words belong to an age when Panegyrics were habitually addressed to the Roman emperors, an age when it would be hard to say where flattery paused, or what particular merit it forbore to dwell upon. We may form some idea of the extravagance which even good and estimable men allowed themselves in speaking of imperial virtues, from two orations, the first complete, the second fragmentary, which the rhetorician Ausonius and the orator Symmachus delivered in honour of Gratian. Ausonius had been appointed consul by his royal pupil, and had received the notification of his appointment in the following words: cum de consulibus in annum creandis solus mecum uolutarem, ut me nosti atque ut facere debui, ut uelle te sciui, consilium meum ad deum rettuli. Eius auctoritati obsecutus te consulem designaui et declaraui et priorem muncupaui (Auson. Grat. Act. ad Gratian. § 44 ed. Schenkl). ${ }^{1}$ The language of this imperial message would hardly stand the test of criticism-it is harsh and somewhat rude. But Ausonius, in a rapture of admiration, exclaims: 'When did speech ever show more lucid arrangement? When was learning so careful to speak in the proper language of elections, and to avoid any admixture of foreign words with the terms sanctioned by antiquity?' And he goes on to examine the whole clause by clause, and ends with asking, 'If I order this letter of yours to be hung like an imperial edict on every pillar and portico from which it may be read distinctly, surely I shall be rewarded with as many honorary statues as each copy of the letter has pages.' And again, § 68, 'I should go on to say something of your powers as a speaker were I not afraid of self-complacency. Not Sulpicius more violent in his harangues, not more admirable the self-restraint of the elder Gracchus, not your own father more authoritative or weighty. What grand tones in the vehement passages! What fine modulation in the unimpassioned! What happy blending of both when you deliver each alternately. Where is the orator who has either expressed, or, as he might do more freely, thought out gay ideas with such humour, eloquent ideas with such finish, contradictory statements with such compression, compressed statements with such volume?' Symmachus is not less pronounced in his own way : 'Henceforth we believe antiquity. In the same tent of yours books and arms are handled equally. And as circumstances and times vary, you have abundant matter to pass in review. History is your amusement in fighting : when your men are to be addressed, you have hortatory harangues; judicial pleadings when you are in conference; poetry when you are triumphing' (Symm. Orat. ad Gratian. p. 33r, Seeck). And again, in a letter to the same emperor (Seeck, p. 78) : 'Let your divine intellect, August prince, Glory of the Roman name, be borne on the chariot of its eloquence : as for myself, in the Return of Thanks I make, I do but creep on the ground, fitter to aspire to the comic sock than the tragic buskin, now that oratory has

[^2]become an Imperial possession. For all I know, indeed, you have given the Muses lodging and entertainment in the Palace.' Similarly, Epist. i. 2o, he calls Gratian eruditissimus Imperator.

Could this language be addressed to Theodosius the Great? Aurelius Victor, or whoever was the author of the Epitome of the Lives of the Caesars from Augustus to Theodosius, speaks of his learning in these words, c. 48 Litteris, si nimium perfectos contemplemur, mediocriter doctus: sagax plane, multumque diligens ad noscenda maiorum gesta. E quibus non desinebat exsecrari quorun facta superba crudelia libertatique infesta legerat. From this it would seem that Theodosius was a great reader; as may also be inferred from the words in which Claudian makes him address his son, De Quarlo Cons. Honorii 396418 , the beginning of which may be quoted:

Interea Musis, animus dum mollior, insta,
Et quae mox imitere, legas: nec desinat umquam
Tecum Graia loqui, tecum Romana uetustas.
Antiquos cuolue duces, adsuesce futurae
Militiae, Latium retro te confer in acuum.
Libertas quaesita placet: mirabere Brutum.
Perfidiam damnas: Metti satiabere poenis.
Triste rigor nimius: 'Torquati despue mores.
Mors inpensa bonum: Decios uencrare ruentes.
Zosimus tells us Theodosius encouraged $\mu i \mu \circ \boldsymbol{\gamma} \boldsymbol{\gamma} \lambda \boldsymbol{i} o i \omega \nu$, dancers, and everything that contributes to this flagitious and irregular music (iv. 33). It is therefore probable that he was not averse to the lighter literature, whether the degraded comedies of his time, of which a curious specimen is still extant in the Querolus, or such jeux d' esprit as Ausonius' Cento Nuptialis, with the other pieces contained in his Eidyllia and Epistulac. Indeed there is a still extant autograph letter written by Theodosius to Ausonius, in which he begs him to send copies of his poems, not only such as were known to the Emperor already, but others of which report had informed him: and he comprares himedf to Aususius. de tarnes that his atmiration for the poet was not less, and his love certainly more. (Cf. Ausonius' dextrous reply Epist. ii Schenkl.)

So far there is nothing in Avianus' preface which is incompatible with the ascription of the Fables to the Emperor Theodosius. If Theodosius had any ${ }^{1}$ literary bent it would be in this direction: cf. Epitom. ib. simplicia ingenia acque diligere, erudita mirari, sed innoxia, a good description of our fabulist. Again, the words of the Preface habes crgo opus quo animum oblectes, ingentum exerccas, sollicitudines leues, totumpue uiucndi ordinem cautus agnoscas seem aptly enough to describe the brief hours of amusement which the cares of war and government would leave Theodosius. Nor is there any great difficulty in accepting the words Thcodosi optime as meant for the Bmperar. Cannegieter's remark that the syle of arimus belonged in [^3]a peculiar and special sense to Trajan (Plin. Paneg. ii) will hardly bear the test of research, if it is meant to imply that no succeeding Emperor was so addressed: but it is remarkable that the Epitomator quoted above draws an elaborate parallel between Trajan and Theodosius; and as the characters and even the features of the two Emperors resembled each other, there would be an implied compliment in addressing Theodosius with the word which antiquity had consecrated to Trajan ${ }^{1}$.

The Preface however must be judged as a whole. So considered it suggests, I think, rather the confidential, almost familiar tone of an equal, than the deferential style of a subject. Avianus begins by saying that being in doubt what form of literature to select for the preservation of his name, he had chosen fables as making fiction natural, and truth unnecessary. A prince would resent such language, and justifiably. 'Why should this scribbler parade his wish to be immortal? Why should he tell me that truth is unpalatable, and fiction the only thing acceptable to kings?' Avianus proceeds with an exaggerated compliment. He will not mention formal prose or verse to so incomparable a master of Latin and Greek style as Theodosius : prose or verse, Greek or Latin, he is superior to the best critics in either. Can we believe that the great and simple-minded Theodosius would welcome so enormous a falsehood ? It seems to me impossible. It is far more likely that Avianus is addressing some acknowledged leader in literature, whose name would be familiar to his readers and serve as a guarantee for his own performance. He might speak to the author of the Saturnalia, to Macrobius Ambrosius Theodosius, as Ausonius speaks to the greatest orator of his time, to Q. Aurelius Symmachus. Epist. xvii: Quisquam ita nitet ut comparatus tibi non sordeat? quis ita Aesopi uemustatem, quis sophisticas Isocratis conclusiones? quis ita ad enthymemata Demosthenis aut opulentiam Tillianam aut proprietatem nostri Maronis accedat? quis ita affectet singrula, ut tu imples omnia? quid enim aliud es quam ex ommi bonarum artium ingenio collecta perfectio?

It is not necessary to prove at length how fully the author of the Commentarii in Somnium Scipionis and the Saturnalia comes up to the words of Avianus, cum in ulroque litterarimn genere et Atticos Graeca eruditione superes et latinitate Romanos. Ian shows from the subscriptio still extant in some MISS that the Commentary on the Sumnium Sciftionis was revised by Aurelius Memmius Symmachus ${ }^{2}$, a air consularis, perhaps in the fifth century; that collections of excerpts were made from it; and that it was translated in the fourteenth century into Greek by Maximus Planudes, the translator of Ovid's Metamorphoses.

[^4] VEL DISliNS MEV̄ RAYENNุE CV̆MACROBIO. PLOY゙NO EVDOXIO, VC.

The larger and more important work of Macrobius, the Suturnathe, has not indeed come down to us in its entirety: but the considerable fragment which remains, particularly the discussion on Vergil and the sources which he imitated or from which he drew his materials (Books iv-vi), shows not only the extent of his reading both in Latin and Greek, but the exactness of his knowledge and the combined antiquarianism and freshness of his criticism. Prof. Nettleship, who has minutely compared the remarks of Macrobius on Vergil with those of Servius, declares that "in the great majority of cases where Servius and Macrobius have identical notes, those of Macrobius are far the fuller, clearer and more logical;' and John of Salisbury (Polycr. viii. 10) says of the first book that, rightly viewed, it was such and so full as to be sufficient in itself for all purposes of reference. 'The physical discussions scattered through the Saturnalia prove a different kind of erudition ; here Nacrobius must have mainly drawn from prose sources, and those Greek: they have however no less than the rest of the work the double merit of proving the author's competence to deal with very difficult problems and of being written in an interesting style. If indeed the grammatical treatise $D_{e}$ differentios et sociclatibus Graeci Latinique uerbi, some extracts from which are headed Theodosius Symmacho suo in a MS at Vienna, cod. Vindob. i6 (Keil Gramm. Lat. v. p. 596), is rightly attributed to 'Theodosius Nacrobius, we have a more special instance of his erudition as a grammarian dealing with the comparative inflexions of Greek and Latin verbs. It is observable that Avianus compliments his Theodosius on his latinity. Now this word is used several times in the abovementioned treatise i. 3 dualem mulla latinitas admisit, ii. 3 latinitas conpositi uerbi sacpe primam syllabam mulat, vi. 13 ipsum autem I adeo latinitas non recipit, ut pro ca ctiam in Graecis nominibus P et H utatur, ut Philippus Phaidon: and not unfrequently in the Saturnalia.

I have shown that the preface of Avianus' Fables may well have been inscribed to 'Theodosius Macrobius. I have also made it probable that the names Avianus and Avienus being confused, not only in MSS of the Fables, but elsewhere (e. g. Sat. i. 4. I7 lan's best MS $B$ (the Bambergensis) gives Auiene), the Avianus or Avienus of the liables may be the youthful Avienus of the Siturnalia. It remains to find approximately the probable period of the composition of the Fables.

Macrobius tells us, S. i. I. 5, that some of the interlocutors in his dialogue did not reach maturity till after the period of Practextatus (uni aut alteri ex his quos coetus coegit matura actas posterior sacculo Practextati fuit). Sceck's lucid biography of Practextatus (Symm. Op. pp. lxxxiii-xc) makes it easy to fix this period within two dates, either from his proconsulate of Achaia in 362 to his death in 385 , the year after he had been appointed Praefectus Praetorio; or, if the meaning of the term saeculi is slightly restricted, from 367 when Praetextatus was Prefect of the City to his death. Within this period of twentythree or eighteen years we may suppose the banquet held which is the scene of the dialogue in the Salurnalia. Avienus at the time of the dialogue is described as adulescens: if he was seventeen in 370 or 375 , he would have been born in 353 or 358 , and would be twenty years of age in 373 or 378 . Or reckoning from the earlier date 362 he would be twenty in $3^{6} 5$, thirty in 375 .

There is a passage in Ausonius' Gratiarum Actio to the Emperor Gratian, delivered in 379 , in which I seem to trace an allusion to a fable not indeed contained in our Babrius but extant in several prose Greek versions (Halm Fab. Aesop. 270 ) and versified by Avianus, XXVI. A lion (the Greek has a wolf) seeing a she-goat standing on a precipice advises her to come down to the safe pastures of flowering shrubs below. The goat declines, pleading the greater danger of falling into the lion's jaws: ending with this distich Nam quamuis rectis constet sententia uerbis, Suspectam hanc rabidus consiliator habes.

Compare with this the words of Ausonius (x. 4r)'solus mecum uolutarem,' o profundi altitudo secreti! habes ergo consiliatorem et non metuis proditorem. Not only the general aptness of the fable to the occasion, but the special introduction of the word consiliatorem make it probable that Avianus' work is here alluded to by Ausonius. It is true that the same word is used, though far less appositely for the purpose of Ausonius, by Phaedrus (ii. 6) in his fable of the Tortoise and the Eagle ; and it is also true that Ausonius knew the Latinized prose fables of Julius Titianus (Epist. xvi. 2. 81, 92), and himself contributed an elegiac version of one fable of the Babrian collection (Epigr. 75, 71 Schenkl, Babr. 75). If, however, Ausonius is here referring to our Fabulist, Avianus, or, as we have seen reason for calling him, Avienus, had published his fables before 379. Not much can be inferred from Macrob. S. vii. 8. 6 where Disarius alludes to the wellknown fable of the Oak and Reed in language which need have no reference to any particular version, yet has some resemblance to Av. XVI: uento nimio abies aut quercus auellitur, cannam mulla facile frangit procella. The date of the publication of the Saturnalia is uncertain, but it probably falls within 400-420.

More distinctly like a reference to our Fables is a passage from a letter of Symmachus i. IOI addressed to Syagrius in 380 or 381 : Video, Consul amplissime, quantum mihi amor tuus honoris imponat. Tubes te adeam et coram defruar magistratus tui gaudio. Quo pacto istud possum negare, nisi ea religione ignoueris qua uocasti? nam quid agam fortunae dubius, cum hinc inuiter ad obsequia honoris tui, hinc luctu amissi fratris impediar? Duae mithi simul personae dispares offeruntur. Qui fieri potest ut os umum contrariis adfectionious induamus? This is very like the language in which the Satyr in our Fabulist angrily dismisses the Traveller, who has put his mouth to the two different uses of warming and cooling. Av. XXIX. 21,22 :

Nolo, ait, ut nostris umquam successerit antris,
Tam diuersa duo qui simul ora ferat.
Again Unrein rightly points out (De Aetate Auiani, p. 60) that the words of the Preface fabularum textus occurrit, quod in his urbane concipla falsitas decat it nom incumbat necissitus wiritutis seem to be alluded. to by Macrobius Comm. Somn. Scip. i. 2. 7 fubulue, quarim nomen indicat falsi professionem; again §9, ex iis autem, quae ad quandam uirtutis speciem intellectum legentis hortantur, fit secunda discretio: in quibusdam enim et argumentum ex ficto locatur et per mendacia ipse relationis ordo contexitur, ut sunt illae Aesopi fabulae elegantia fictionis illustres; and again § 10 , prior species quae concepla de falso per falsum narratur. Other points in which the fabulist and the antiquarian illustrate each other will be found in the notes on XII. 5, Introduction to IV.

It seems then more than probable that in 380-381 Symmachus had the work of Avienus before him ; nearly certain that early in the fifth century Macrobius alludes to it; not unlikely that Ausonius (i) adopted an allusion and a word from it in 379: (2) was possibly led by imitation or rivalry to translate himself a Babrian fable into the same Elegiac metre ${ }^{1}$.

It follows that Avienus must have been quite a young man at the time he published his forty-two Fables; and as the fame of Macrobius belongs either to the beginning of the fifth or the later years of the fourth century, it may have been between 370-379 that Avienus dedicated them to him, already well known in the learned and literary world. This was the period of revived opposition to Christianity, the period of Praetextatus, Symmachus, and the other supporters of the old Pagan creeds, whom Macrobius has introduced in his elaborate dialogue the Saturnalia. The different characters of the iwo men are exhibited in the scoffing reply of Praetextatus to Ambrose, Bishop of Milan, 'I will turn Christian, if you will make me bishop of Rome,' and the famous Relation which Symmachus, when urban Prefect in 384, addressed to the Emperor Valentinian [Seeck p. xvi] in behalf of the Senate for the restoration of the altar of Victory. Seeck sums up the conflict in words which I will condense here (pp. liii sqq.).

The Pagan rites in part suppressed by Constantius had been restored by Julian (361) and were left undisturbed in the first years of Talentinian I $(364)$ and (iratian. Both religions still sul)nisted side by side: the Emperors were themselves Christians, but sacrifices (which as early as 341 had been made illegal and stigmatized as sacrificiorum insania by a law of Constantius (Clinton, F. R. i. p. 402)) continued to be performed at the expense of the state, and the altar of Victory still stood in the Curia. Hence in the earlier Epistles of Symmachus the pagan ceremonies are often alluded to ; consultations and decrees of the College of Pontifices are recorded, besides sacrifices for expiation of portents, solemnisation of the festival of the Magna Mater at Rome, and punishment of a Vestal Virgin for unchastity. It is in these years that we may suppose Macrobius to fix the scene of his Dialogue, at a time when Paganism was still sufficiently in the ascendant to be interesting, and when a discussion on the names and attributes of the ancient gods

[^5]would find sympathetic readers. But with 382 , the last year but one of Gratian's reign, a change set in. The Pagan worship ceased to be acknowledged; money spent on its ceremonies was claimed for the fiscus or the chest of the Praefectus Praetorio, the bread purveyed for the use of the Vestals and other attendants or priests was withdrawn, the altar of Victory removed. Then the Senate sent Symmachus to protest, but he failed to obtain even a hearing. The gods avenged themselves by a dearth which cut short the bread-supply of Rome, and by the violent death of Gratian in 383 . The Pagan party took heart. Praetextatus and Symmachus were conjointly appointed praefectus praetorio and praefectus urbi for 384 ; and a decree was obtained commanding the restitution of all ornaments taken from temples or other public buildings. In the summer of 384 they tried to obtain a repeal of the law of Gratian, and to have the Pagan worship placed on its former footing. The Relatio of Symmachus on the altar of Victory followed: but though the whole of the imperial consistory was deeply moved by its eloquence, the representations of Ambrose prevailed, and the altar was not restored. Soon after followed the series of Theodosian edicts, by which sacrifices were prohibited, the temples closed, instruments of idolatry seized or destroyed, and the privileges of priests abolished (Gibbon, c. xxviii. vol. iii. p. 9 of Nilman's Edition).

If then Avienus wrote his fables at any time between 365 and 379 he might naturally speak of temples, altars, sacrifices, sacrificingpriests, victims, incense, and images of the gods as still existing and in habitual use. Isis still had her worshippers, and baldness, which forms the motif of the tenth fable and of a learned discussion in the last book of Macrobius, was still a common sight in Roman streets. Such a hypothesis is not indeed necessary: for the fables descend not only from the epoch of Babrius, which Otto Crusius shows to be the reign of Alexander Severus, (222-235), but in some cases from the Aesopic age, the sixth or seventh century в.c. And fables are repeated from one narrator to another with little if any change of scene or surroundings. Yet in reading the forty-two apologues which our author selected from the far longer collection of Babrius, it is difficult to escape the impression of a homogeneous whole, worked up with a purpose, and using as a back-ground the circumstances of every-day life as it existed at the time. If my view is right as to the authorship of this little work, which though widely read in the dark and middle ages, has in modern times almost fallen out of view, and only been brought into renewed notice by the still recent discovery of the Greek text of Babrius on which it was founded, the author was a member of a literary coterie which treasured as sacred every surviving remnant of ancient Roman usage, its religion no less than its language. He was therefore not a Christian, of which belief the fables certainly offer no hint, though it is possible that XXIII represents a point of view peculiarly, if not exclusively, Christian.

II.

THE PROSODY OF AVIANUS.

Cannegieter in his Dissertation on the age and style of Avianus argued that he wrote in the second century of our era and during the reign of the Antonines. The same view has in our own time been held by one of the greatest of philologists, Lachmann; and it is necessary to examine what are the grounds for this opinion.

Cannegieter's first argument was a historical inference. In the preface to his work Avianus gives a short account of his predecessors. Verum has pro cxemplo fubulas el Socrales diunisis operibus indidit et pocmati suo Flaccus apluuit, quod in se sub iocorum communium specie mitae argumenta contincant. Quas Graecis ambis Babrius repetens in duo uolumina coar-lauit, Phacdrus cliam partem aliquam quinque in tibellos resoluit. De his cso ad quadraginta el duas in unum redaclas fabulas dedi. Besides Horace, who has occasionally introduced fables into his Satires and Epistles, Phacdrus is the only Roman fabulist alluded to. Yet we know from Ausonius (Epist. xvi. 2. S1, 92) that a collection of Greek Aesopic fables in iambic trimeters (whether the scazons of Babrius, as Cannegieter, Wernsdorf, O. Crusius (De Babrii Actate p. 238 note) believe, or as 1 think a version in ordinary iambic trimeters like those which diversify the ordinary Greek prose of Halm's collection (c. g. 20, from Aristoph. Vesp. I 402 sqq., $33^{\text {b }}, 77$, $252,280,334^{c}$, 39 I ; cf. $248^{\mathrm{b}}$, which, though in prose, shews traces of an iambic original, cf. Rutherford, p. xxii) had been translated into Latin prose by Julius Titianus. Auson. Epist. xvi to Probus Apologos Tiliani al Nipolis Chronica, quasi alios apologos (nam et ipsa instar sunt fabulurum) ad nobititatim tuam misi: and again in the Epodi which his friend is to read as the fore-words to the fables (antilogium fabularum) he say's v. 74 :-

And again 102

> Sed iame ut loquatur Iutius Fandi modum inuita accipe Volucripes dimetria.

This Julius Titianus was identified by Casaubon (on Capitol. Vit. Maximin. Iunioris c. i) with the Titianus senior, whom Capitolinus calls father of a Titianus who taught oratory to the younger Maximinus. This elder Titianus was nicknamed the ape of his Epoch (simiar lemporum suorum Capitol. l.c.), and may therefore be plausibly identified with the Julius Titianus who, as we learn from Sidonius (Ipp. i. r) was called oratorum simia by the other Frontonians. He would thus have been a follower of the famous orator Fronto, the preceptor of M. Aurelius ; and as Maximinus, the father of the younger Titianus' pupil, became Emperor in 235, the elder Titianus may be assigned to the immediately preceding reigns of Elagabalus (218), Macrinus (217), Caracallus (2II), and perhaps may be pushed back as far as Commodus (180). Now as Avianus in the list of his predecessors in Latin Fable does not allude to Julius Titianus, he cannot have known him, and must therefore have lived before him. Hence his own period may be the age of the Antonines, with which the diction of the Fables would agree.

To all this Wernsdorf's reply seems sufficient (De Carm. Aviani in his Poet. Lat. Min. v. pp. 664 sqq.). Avianus in his Preface does not give an exhaustive list of his predecessors. He mentions only representative types, Socrates, Horace, Babrius, Phaedrus-the two former as introducing apologues to illustrate their subject, the two latter as writers of apologues in verse. If Cannegieter's reasoning were valid, we might as well conclude that Babrius lived intermediate between Horace and Phaedrus. But as we now know, Phaedrus, a contemporary of the Emperor Tiberius, preceded Babrius by nearly two centuries. I assume, what since Otto Crusius' Essay I suppose no one will deny, that the Alexander to whom Babrius addressed his Fables is Alexander Severus. (See Rutherford, pp. xi-xxiv.) Or again we might with equal plausibility maintain that Phaedrus lived after Seneca, because he is ignored in a well-known passage of the Consolatio ad Polybium, viii. ${ }^{2} 7$ Non audeo te usque eo producere ut fabellas quoque et Aesopeos logos intemptatum Romanis ingeniis opus, solita tibi uenustate conectas.

But, in truth, though there is much probability in Casaubon's identification of Ausonius' prose writer of Latin Apologues, Julius Titianus, with the elder Titianus of Capitolinus, we have nothing to prove that they were the same. Gerard John Voss (De Historicis Latinis ii. p. 173 ed. ${ }^{1651}$ ) thought the younger of Capitolinus' Titiani was the Apologue-writer; and O. Crusius remarks that such an occupation would better suit a schoolmaster, such as the younger Titianus, than a man of literary distinction like his father (p. 244).

Cannegieter's other argument, from the diction and prosody of Avianus, requires a fuller and more detailed examination. It will be convenient to take these in reversed order.

The first scholar who subjected the Fables to a close metrical review was the eighteenth century philologist and critic, John Hildebrand Withof. In his Encaenia Critica published in 1741, most of which is occupied with a critical examination of the text of Lucan, a section is given to the Elegies of Maximianus, and another to the Fables of Avianus. Of Maximianus, and Withof's valuable services to his often vitiated text, I have spoken in the American Journal of Philology (vol. v. pp. $1-15,145-163$ ). His remarks on Avianus are not less acute ; but his corrections are less happy. Yet it should not be forgoten that his criticisms anticipated Lachmann by a complete century，and that several of his emendations have now a permanent place in the best editions of the Fables．

If we look at the Elegiacs of Avianus as a whole，the general impres－ sion is one of correctness marred by occasional licences．Deviations from classical prosody of a serious kind are rare ：omitting a certain number of cases in which the first half of the pentameter is allowed to terminate either with hiatus or on a positionally short syllable（which cases will be considered later），the only violations of strict metre are uelis 1II．6，XXIII．го，dispăr XI．5，XXIII．8，inpăr XVIII．ェо， Paeönio VI．7，făbella VIII．2，nŏlaǹ VII．8，pröfundens XXXV．i， alteriūs XXXV．4，herěs XXXV．14，exstinctūs ut XXII．I5．

Lachmann（Kleine Schriften pp． 5 r sqq．）argued from pröfundens and heres in XXXV，the former of which is rare，the latter im－ possible，that the fable in the shape our MSS give to it is corrupt； that part of it may be restored by conjecture；part is mere inter－ polation of a later age，probably the seventh and eighth centuries． Hence he changed geminum profundens to geminums una profundens， and bracketed vv．3－6，13－16 as spurious．

Again analysing XXIII he concluded from disfar in 8，uetis in ro，as well as from numerous faults of language scattered throughout the fable，that 8 and 9 ，as well as the epimythion 13，14，are an inter－ polation，that io must be changed to Sive decus busti sen decus esse uelis，and that I，5，7，II are to be restored by reading insignem arte ferens，Aller ut ornatis，ambiguo，Subdila nempe tibi est．

In these violent changes he had some support from Bentley，who observing that the Epimythia were not in the Gale codex（since collated for Bährens by H．A．J．Aunro），concluded that they were all spurious （on Horace A．P．337）．

Here however，since Fröhner＇s collation of the three oldest Paris MSS，we are able to meet Lachmann on firmer ground．The promysthia and cpimythia which these exhibit are at any rate of an carly date，for the MSS themselves can scarcely be later than century $x$ ，and may be earlier，as Fröhner，a good judge，believed．On the other hand MISS of a decidedly later date contain epimythia which do not occur in any of the best：and these are undoubtedly spurious． It is these later epimythia which are omitted in the Galeanus：but no argument can be drawn from the Galecmus against the genuineness of the others，for like all the other early MSS it contains them．

Lachmann however argued on general principles．Visible to his eye as the substratum of the Fables was＇nobilior aliqui antiquitatis color；＇and where language or metre palpably contradicted this view， a later hand had been at work，and conjecture must restore the original but defaced fabric．

The problem is not a very easy one to decide．Lachmann may have failed to restore the original Avianus，but defects of execution do not disprove a hypothesis as a possibility．And at least some part of his hypothesis appears to me indubitably true．The general correct－ ness of Avianus＇prosody＇throws the occasional exceptions into strong， almost glaring，relief．To take the most prominent instance ；out of 32 I pentameters there are two in which hiatus is admitted in the middle of the verse, XXVIII. 12 Quam ferus in domini or a sequentis agit, XLI. 8 Immemor illa sui'Amphora dicor' ait: XXVII. so (Unrein p. 20) is very doubtful. There are ten in which the first half of the pentameter ends with a syllable which as standing before a vowel or $h$ is positionally short. They are :-

III. 12

Alterius censor ut uitiosa notes.
XI. 6
XIX. 12
XXII. 4

XXXIV. io
XXXV. 16
XXXVIII. 6
XLI. 18

To which may be added as at least exceptional-XXIX. 22 Tam diuersa duō qui simul ora ferat.

It is remarkable that only three of these XXVII. $10, \mathrm{XXXV}$. 6 , and XLI. 18 occur in epimythia: the remaining seven are in the body of the fable. But of these three, the last is now, on the authority of my excellent and uninterpolated British Museum codex $B$, to be written with ne for ut: XXVII. 10, XXXV. 16 admit of easy correction, the former by substituting cornix for uolucris, the latter by reading Rursus spes humiles. Yet it must remain a question, whether they are not accretions of a later age, as Lachmann thought: what is nearly certain, is, thal they are not the casual or intended slips of a generally correct writer.

Of the remaining seven the greater part admit of easy and almost certain emendation; XIX. 12, XXXIV. 10 by simply transposing two consecutive words; XI. 6, XXII. 6 by readings found in MSS not before known: for in XI. 6 uagans for uagzs rests on the authority of ut peteretur $B$; in XXII. 6 my Bodleian codex $X$ gives precibus confiteretur, whence I restore the manifestly true reading precibus quom peteretur. XXII. 4 Withof emended by substituting liuidus for inuidus, a conjecture admitted by Lachmann and all subsequent editors. Two remain which must be considered doubtful, III. 12 and XXXVIII. 6 ; that they are so does not prove that they come from Avianus, but that the lines of conjecture are insufficiently defined. III. 12 may be a later accretion, as Lachmann thought: XXXVIII. 6 belongs to a fable which on other grounds is open to suspicion, notably from the use of debile in 12. As for duō in XXIX. 22, which L. Müller and Krenkel show to occur more than once in Prudentius, it can hardly be thought a certain test of lateness, and may fairly be compared with the rare modo which, as Munro after Lachm, shows, is found in Plautus, Terence, Lucilius, Lucretius and Cicero's Aratea (on Lucr. ii. I I35).

We may now return to the ten violations of classical prosody mentioned on p. xxiv. They are uetus dispăr inpăr Pacönio făbella nölam pröfundens alteriūs herës exstinctüs. Of these ten, two; Pacơnio pröfundens, cannot be taken into account: for Paconius, as Dr. Ingram shows (Hermathena ix. 407) is regularly used with short o in the Latin poets, Verg. Aen. vii. 769 , xii. 40I, Ovid MI. xv. 535, Sil. xiv. 27 , Stat. S. i. 4. 108, Claud. B. Get. 121 , in II. Cons. Stil. 173 , in Eutrop. ii. 12, Apon. 67 , for in spite of Ramsay (Prosody p. 118), Conington (see however the doubtful note on xii. 401), and others, I cannot but agree with Lachmann's view (Lucret. v. 85) that synizesis in a Greek word of this kind is unlikely, if not impossible: and pröfundere is found certainly in Cat. lxiv. 202, Claud. Nilus 12, perhaps Luc. vii. ${ }^{5} 59$ (Luc. Müller de R. M. p. 363). Again fäbclla alterī̀s castinctīs though supported by most of the earliest MSS cannot be thought to come certainly from Av. ; for the tenth century Paris codex $C$ has fabula nostra written as a v. l. over nostra fabella; for alterius several MISS as early as century thirteen give Alleriusque; and castinctūs ut, if indeed it is not accus. plural of a noun, may so easily be corrected (sce App. Crit. on XXII. 15) as a participle, as to give no difficulty: The remaining five stand on a different footing. It is perhaps noteworthy that uelis and dispar both occur in XXIII, a fable which on grounds of syntax and unusual obscurity is open to suspicion. Still both ucliss and disfăr (as well as inpăr) occur again, III. 6, XI. 5, XVIII. io; and none of them can be said to belong to classical prosody, though uelis as a word of frequent occurrence is more excusable than possis of most MSS of Juv. v. ro (possit the Pithocanus) ; and the shortening of the $a$ in the inflected cases of fa $\bar{r}^{1}$ had a natural tendency to react on the nominative, of. pes tripès, but bifěs trifĕs quadrufës in one v. of Ausonius. nơlam in VII. 8, though not quite certain, for the Lunensis has notam, and one of the Peterhouse MSS uolam, was the reading of the early MS from which the author of the Grammatical treatise in Hagen's Anecdota Heluctica quotes it, i. e. of a MS at least as early as the eighth or ninth century. It is, I think, the most outrageous of the violations of correct prosody which the Fables present, and like herĕs (for which Lachm. wrote heris, I do not know on what authority), could not possibly be assigned to any but a late writer.

Lachmann disposed of all these cases either by emendation or the supposition that they were interpolated. They did not, in fact, come up to the required standard of purity which he traced in the real Avianus. But suppose them all genuine ; may not a Lachmannian hypothesis not indeed of a second century Avianus, coeval with the Antonines, but of an Avianus closely following Babrius, be true?

Prof. E. A. Freeman (Methods of Historical Study pp. 197 sqq.) has called attention to the fact which we are too ready to ignore, that there

[^6]was a stage in the history of the Roman Empire when Latin nearly gave way to Greek. 'For a season, even in the western lands, Latin seemed to have passed away as the tongue of anything that claimed to be literature. . . . If the feeble thread of the Augustan History did not bind together the age of Trajan and the age of Diocletian, we might almost say that it was by the Christian writers of Roman Africa that the Latin tongue was kept alive.' The Letters of Fronto and his pupil M. Aurelius, the Noctes Atticae of A. Gellius, the Golden Ass of Apuleius, in prose : in verse the De Medicina Praecepta of Q. Serenus Sammonicus, the fine fragment of Nemesianus' Cymegetica, the Peruigilium Veneris which Bücheler assigns to the second or third century, and the Concubitus Mrartis et Veneris of Reposianus are the best surviving representations of the literature of this epoch. No doubt many poems of the Anthologia Latina belonged to it besides; but the dates of most of these are unknown or uncertain. Hence we are left with a very inadequate knowledge of the gradual modifications by which the metre and prosody of Silius, Statius, Val. Flaccus, Juvenal, and Martial passed into the wholly different metre and prosody of Ausonius and Prudentius. There is therefore no a priori improbability in the view that the original Avianus belonged to the age of Alexander Severus or his immediate successors. And it would be very rash to assert that the violations of classical prosody just examined were impossible in 250 A.D. because they were impossible in 120 .

Let us look at the two indubitable specimens of the poetry of this interval, the 1107 hexameters of Serenus Sammonicus (circ. 200235 A. D.) and the fragm. of Nemesianus' Cynegetica edited by Haupt. The only departures from strict prosody which Serenus Sammonicus exhibits are the short -to of the imperative confunditŏ curatŏ iungitŏ permulcetŏ, etc., the lengthening (if MSS may be trusted) of poterīs 12, and of uomica 738 . In diction he is more distinctly unclassical, fimus as neuter 599,714 , penitis as dat. plur. of an adj. penitus (448), perhaps absorbitur (so Bährens) for absorbetur 460 . Elision, though not over frequent, is pretty regular: in 221 verses I have counted 65 elisions, which gives an average of 2 for 7 lines. The metre and diction of Nemesianus ( $2555^{-28} 4$ A. D.) are, as might be expected in a didactic poem imitating Vergil and Gratius, more severe ; deuotiŏ exercetŏ, hiatus once catuli huc 150, feruida zonae as the end of a hexameter ${ }^{5} 54$, with the rare words inocciduus, cibatus. Elision is very sparingly employed : the 325 vv . contain, it is true, 52 elisions, an average of about I to 6 lines: but long passages occur (e.g. $96-124$ ) without any; and a large majority are cases of elided que or atque. On the other hand the hexameter poem of Reposianus (253 in Riese's Anthol. Latina), which Teuffel seems rightly to assign to the third century, exhibits two violent transgressions of correct prosody, two monosyllabic in 93 , gratiosa seemingly a palimbacchius $(--v)$ in 126 . But as the text of this poem rests on one MS only, and the metre is otherwise carefully correct, no great weight can be given to these two errors. Elision occurs 21 times, i.e. an average of 2 in 17 lines, or rather more than $I$ in 8.

Such an estimate, based on very scanty materials, and those of quite a different kind from the work of Avianus, must needs be rough and cannot prove anything. Yet so far as it goes, it seems to shew that the tradition of clas-sical p, menoty remained substamtially unaltered in good writers up to the age of Diocletian. It is of course true that writers such as the Christian poet Commodianus ( $238-250$ A.D.), in whom all laws of metre are set at defiance, were beginning to tell upon literature ; and it is very probable that much of the Latin Anthology which we might be willing to assign to a period of barbarism, really dates from the second or third century. Still, taking the more formal productions of the interval from the Antonines to Diocletian as a standard of the correctness of literary works, we may perhaps say that the five cases of abnormal prosody which a review of the Fables left unaccounted for would not have been tolerated in a set work of the period under consideration.

If then the original kernel of Avianus is to be placed in the latter half of the second or again in the third century, we must first climinate at least seven verses which are inconsistent with an age of metrical purity. Now allowing that two of these verses XXIII. 8, io fall under reasonable suspicion, from the rough and obscure style of the fable as a whole, and that the distich containing XVIII. io seems unnecessary and may be an interpolation, it is impossible to remove III. 6, XI. 5, VII. 8, XXXV. I 4, from their place without virtually destroying in each case the whole fabric of the fable. It seems safer to believe that they are real evidences of a declining feeling of metrical correctness, and are the production of a later time.

The sum of the above argument is that Lachmann's hypothesis of an early and purer text of which our extant Avianus is a barbarized depravation, is quite borne out as regards metre by the general correctness of the verse and by the variations of the NISS: but that the violations of classical prosody, which after a critical examination still remain unaccounted for, do not justify us in pushing the first composition of the Fables back to a period either as early as the Antonines (which the probable date of Babrius makes impossible) or to the time between Alexander Severus and Diocletian.

III.

THE DICTION AND SYNTAX OF AVIANUS.

The style of Avianus has been variously estimated by different (rities. l:herhard of lecthune in his $I$.al? minthus (iii. 9) written in the thinteenth cemtury speaks of his fouterier strvus. Lilius (jyratulus (1)e Poetis Dial. is) diemisses him wibh a fow words. as unworthy of serions attention. Nevelet found the fables full of faults which must be condoned as written in a debased period and on which it was useless to waste thought or time. Caspar Barth in one mood lauds him as an elegant poet comparable with the best (Aduers. xxvii. 4, xxxix. 7, especially xxxix. 13), and with Atticisms of style (xxxix. 13), in another censures him as an unskilful and rustic writer of the meaner kind, full of barbarisms, with no judgment, and crassly ignorant of metre (Aduers, xix. 24, xxvii. 4, xxix. 13). Nicolas Heinsius (Adu. 6II) says 'quoties incido in Avieni fabellas, elegantes sane lepidasque, toties indignor aut oscitantibus ac inscitis librariis, aut aliis hominibus male feriatis tam multum in eas licuisse. Adeo soloecismis syllabisque nunc contra legem metricam productis, nunc correptis sunt inquinatae.' Cannegieter distinguished the true Avianus from the false; the true was polished pure Vergilian, and might well belong to the age of MI. Aurelius: the false was mainly the work of school-masters, who in their eagerness to point a moral for the edification of theiŕ young pupils, added promythia and epimythia which have disguised the simple proportions of the original. Withof (Encaenia Critica, p. 23 I sqq.) while declaring that the corrupt state of Avianus' text was such as might well draw tears, ascribed these faults to the copyists and set himself to the task of removing them by conjecture. Wopkens ${ }^{1}$, by far the ablest scholar who has examined the language and grammar of the fables, accepted them as a genuine product of a very late period, and did great service by recalling critics from the rash attempts at emendation which Cannegieter's edition had encouraged, to a sober examination of the Latin of the fourth and fifth centuries. Wernsdorf (P. L. M. v. p. 669) confesses that the 'childish and inarticulate talk' which Withof had denounced is after all attempts too palpable and unworthy of any but a declining epoch.

In the present century, Édélestand du Méril in the short notice which he has given of Avianus in his Poésies inédites du Mojen Âge (pp. 95-97) describes him in these severe words, 'Le style traînant, embarrassé, sans unité ni aucune propriété d' expression, quelquefois même véritablement barbare, trahit un esprit encore grossier et trop inexpérimenté des choses littéraires pour ne pas ignorer les usages de la prosodie.' L. Müller de Re Metr. p. 55, censures Lachmann for introducing into Avianus' text metrical faults from which they are quite free, but considers their real deviations from strict prosody and pure Latin to point to the latest period of the Empire, the period of Maximianus and Arator. This opinion he seems in his treatise De Phaedri et Auiani Fabulis, p. 32, to modify so far as to place the date not later than the fifth century. The style he considers to have some merits, but to be far inferior to Babrius, and even to Phaedrus. Fröhner
${ }^{1}$ Wopkens' Notes on Avianus were first printed in Miscell. Observatt. Critt. in Auct. Vet. et Recent. vol. vii. Tom. 2, pagg. 197-253 Amstelod. 1736 . Withof's Encaenia Critica appeared in 1741. Both Withof and Wopkens were men of great acuteness. Wopkens in particular, as will be evident to anyone who examines his Aduersaria (published collectively in 1834), was as an exponent of Latin construction and syntax far in advance of his time. Bährens' criticisms of Avianus in his Miscellanea Critica (1878) do not seem to me up to his ordinary mark, (Praef. p. xii) calls Avianus a very rustic story-teller of the fifth century undeniably. Schenkl (Zeitsch. f. Osterr. Gymn. xvi. p. 398) finds none of the grace of Babrius in our collection : but considers it interesting as a momment of tifh contury han_uage, ant perhape as comtaining lost fables of Babrius. Bährens, accepting the views of L. Müller as to the late date of composition, finds much to be tolerated, yet much that is too rough and coarse, as well as too incoherent and absurd, to belong to any time but the Middle Age (Misc. Crit. p. 137). Unrein De Auiani Aetate (Iena 188.5 ) believes the work to have been dedicated to Macrobius the author of the Saturnalia, and identifying him with the praefectus praetorio Mispaniarum of 399 A. D. (cod. Theod. xvi. 10. 15, viii. 5. 61), Proconsul Africae 410 (cod. Theod. xi. 28. 6), pracposilus sacri culiculi 422 (cod. Theod. vi. 8. I) fixes the date of Avianus from $400-420 \mathrm{~A} . \mathrm{D}$. Sittl considers the diction of Ar. essentially barbarous and pronounces him in his want of finish and the awkwardness with which he connects his verses on a par with Dracontius and Corippus.
Before attempting to mediate between views so opposed as those of Heinsius and Du Aléril, it will be worth while to clear the ground, in other words to consider how much of the 42 fables can safely be thought to come from Avianus.

Fabricius (Bibl. Latina iii. p. 555 ed. Ernesti) with whom Du Méril seems to agree (p. 97) thought that some of the Fables were of a later date than most of the Collection ; these had been introduced in place of others which were in the original 42 published by Avianus, which latter were ousted for the new-comers, in order to keep up the specified number of 42. This seems to be supported by a gloss on Dig. xxii. 2. 29, where Aristo is quoted as stating that Cassius used to call a partnership in which one only gained, the other lost, a leomine partnership. A gloss on this passage speaks of 'fabulann Aniani' de socictate leonina,' obviously the fable of the lion hunting with a cow, she-goat and sheep (Phaed. i. 5), or as in the prose Greek versions (Halm Fab. Aesop. 260) with an ass and a for. It is not in our Avianus: yet it may have been in the Avianus which the Glossator had before him. This is true; but the date of the gloss is uncertain, and a slip of memory in quoting a fable as Avianus' (if he is alluded to in Anianz) which was not in his, but in some other collection, would be very easy.

There are however some few distichs and one or two whole fables which are unlike the usual style of the rest. 'The most notable example is XXIII, which the Commentary will show to be from first to last involved in construction, awkward in language (referens in $\mathbf{x}$, omen in 7 , spes in 8, praeslare in 14) and licentious in metre (dispăr, uclis). Rather less objectionable, but open to grave suspicion, is XXXV. It accumulates four metrical faults, pröfundens x , Alteriūs 4 , herës 14, rursüs 16; while as regards language, Fama est qued 1, caro amore 3, queque 13, perhaps exsaturata 4 , seem to point to a different author. A similar doubt attaches to XXXVIII ; for though salibus has been plausibly emended, the use of laboratis for 'got-up,' 'artificial' in 7 , and still more of debile in 12 for 'ignoble,' 'mean,' betrays a very late authorship.

Bentley (on Hor. A. P. 337) maintained that the Epimythia or additional verses in which the fable is applied to a didactic purpose were all spurious, and he asserted that they are not in the Gale MS. The collation of this MS made by H. A. J. Nunro for Bährens proves however that all the Epimythia which are found in Fröhner's three earliest MSS, as well as in the Vossianus L. Q. 86 (Lachmann's antiquissimus), are also in the Galeanus; and this is also true of the Promythia, or moral introductions. There are however in many of the more recent MSS Epimythia of later genesis and obviously forged: it is one of Fröhner's greatest services to have shown that these must be distinguished from the earlier as quite on a different level.

The genuine Epimythia are-
I. I5, 16 Haec sibi dicta putet, seque hac sciat arte notari, Femineam quisquis credidit esse fidem.
II. 15, I6 Sic quicumque noua sublatus laude tumescit, Dat merito poenas, dum meliora cupit.
XVI. 19, 20 Haec nos dicta monent magnis obsistere frustra, Paulatimque truces exsuperare minas.
XXVII. 9, io Viribus haec docuit quam sit prudentia maior, Qua coeptum uolucris explicuisset opus.
XXX. 17, 18 Haec illos descripta monent, qui saepius ausi Numquam peccatis abstinuere manus.
XXXIII. I3, 14 Sic qui cuncta deos uno male tempore poscunt, Iustius his etiam uota diurna negant.
XXXVI. 17,18 preceded by two vv , which end the dialogue. I give all four:
'Proderit ergo grauis quamuis perferre labores, Otia quam tenerum mox peritura pati.'
Est hominum sors ista, magis felicibus ut mors Sit cita, cum miseros uita diurna regat.
XLI. 17, i8 Haec poterunt post haec miseros exempla monere Subdita nobilibus ut (ne $B$ ) sua fata gemant.
XXIII, XXXV are suspicious as wholes: I therefore omit the epimythia belonging to them. The last two vv. of III are not an epimythion proper, but an epimythiastic addition.
The Promythia are the following-
V. I-4 Metiri se quemque decet propriisque iuuari Laudibus, alterius nec bona ferre sibi, Ne detracta grauem faciant miracula risum, Coeperit in solis cum remanere malis.
VII. 1-2 Haud facile est prauis innatum mentibus ut se Muneribus dignas supplicioue putent.
VIII. I-4 Contentum propriis sapientem uiuere rebus, Nec cupere alterius, nostra fabella monet.
Indignata cito ne stet fortuna recursu, Atque eadem minuat, quae dedit ante, rota.
XXXIV. r-4 Quisquis torpentem passus transisse iuuentam Nec timuit uitae prouidus ante mala, Confectus senio, postquam grauis adfuit aetas, Heu frustra alterius saepe rogabit opem.
This conspectus will suffice to shew that the Epimythia and Promythia in Avianus do not stand on the same footing with those in Babrius. Rutherford seems to have decided rightly in rejecting the latter on masse; they are usually very transparent forgeries, and could not possibly come from Babrius. Yet even amongst these there are some which are less pronouncedly spurious than the rest: I may mention xxiv, xxxv, xcviii, civ. Still, speaking of them as a whole, it seems true that 'every kind of error in metre, accidence, and syntax is represented in them' (Rutherford, p. 1xxxviii). And whatever causes were at work to prompt didactic or gnomic additamenta to Babrius, would be equally true of Avianus. The school-boy would ask the meaning of a fable; the schoolmaster would supply this answer and suggest, if he did not himself fabricate, the verses which expressed it. The ттєрvípata and iтткаттípata, as Phrynichus tells us they were called (Rutherford p. lxxxxi), would be forthcoming all the more readily in proportion to the moral purity of the work. It is indeed certain that the fables of Avianus, doubtless for this reason, almost supplanted those of Phaedrus in spite of the literary charm of Phaedrus, and the comparatively early period of the Latin language when he wrote. We know too what care was necessary to keep the text of favorite authors uncontaminated, and to what accidents in spite of all care they were liable. Vettius Praetestatus, the friend of Symmachus, and like him a determined opponent of Christianity, is stated in the iambics with which his wife Paulina addresses him in the Sepulchral Inscription to his memory (C. I. L. vi. 1779 cited in Seeck's ed. of Symmachus p. lxxxiv) to have revised and emended the texts of many authors both in prose and verse :-

Tu namque quidquid lingua utraque est proditum
Cura soforum, porta quis caeli patet, Vel quae periti condidere carmina, Vel quac solutis uocibus sunt edita, Meliora reddis quam legendo sumpseras:
and a subscriptro appended to several MSS of Macrobius' Commentary on the Somnium Scipiomis states that this work had been revised and punctuated by Aurelius Memmius Symmachus. Sidonius (Epp. vi. 15) in sending to his friend Ruricius a volume of the Prophets, tells him it had been cleared from much rubbish, yet that the counter-reader (contra legente) who had undertaken, it would seem, to compare it with another copy, had from ill-health or some other cause not performed his promise. In some cases, indeed, a work was revised and in part re-written long after the author had passed away. The hesameter poem of Dracontius De Creatione Mundi, written circ. 425 A.D., was re-edited by Eugenius, about 220 years after his death (Clinton, F. R. ii. p. 472). Ildefonsus (middle of seventh century), on whose authority this statement rests, gives some particulars so highly illustrative of the casualties of literature at that time as to deserve quotation : Libellos quoque Dracontii de Creatione Mundi conscriptos, quos antiquilas protulerat uitiatos, subtrahendo immutando uel melior ando in pulchritudinis formam coegit ut pulchriores de artificio corrigentis quam de manu processisse uideantur auctoris. Et quia de die septimo idem Dracontius omnimodo reticendo semiplenum opus uisus est reliquisse, iste et sex dierum recapitulationem singulis uersibus renotauit, et de die septimo quae illi uisa sunt eleganter dicta subiunxit (Ildefons. de Scriptor. Ecclesiasticis c. I4). If Eugenius thought he might 'subtract,' 'change,' or 'improve' on a poet who lived 220 years before him, it is perfectly possible that the same thing might happen to the fables of Avianus.

It is necessary, in judging on this question, to consider the Epimythia and Promythia, (1) en masse, (2) singly.
(I) Looked at collectively, they can hardly, I think, be said to stand out from the rest of the work in any marked way. Omitting XXIII and NXXV, which are open to doubt as wholes, the rest of the Epimythia are very much in the prevailing style. In sixteen verses there is only one metrical fault (uolucris explicuisset XXVII. Io). The only peculiarities of diction are descrifta XXX. у 7 , ditrna XXXIII. I 4, XXXVI. 18.

The Promythia are very similar. In twelve verses there is one false quantity făbella, for which however $C$ gives a v. 1. (see above, p.xxvi). In language miracula V. 3, passus Nec timuit XXXIV. I, 2, are hardly classical: but have parallels in the literature of the fourth century.

On the other hand it is noticeable that all the Epimythia are in two vv., all the Promythia except one in four. Rutherford shows that there was a tendency to tetrastichism in the interpolators of Babrius; and it may have become part of a received tradition.
(2) Judged singly, they cannot all be placed on the same level. I. I5, 16 are inseparable from the rest of the fable. To end on v. I 4 would be abrupt: I5, I 6 round off the narrative. II. I5, I 6 are not so necessary: the fable might well end with 14. But in themselves $1_{5}, 16$ are unobjectionable: if anything calls for suspicion it is the rare passive use of exosae in 13 : which however has a parallel in XXXIII. 6. XXXIII. I3, 14 are similar to II. I5, i6 : unobjectionable in themselves, and required to prevent the fable ending suddenly. The epimythion XVI. 19, 20 seems to correspond closely with the similar epimythion of Babr. 36 :

I'ct the variations of the MISS lead me to doubt whether the original reading was not

Haec nos dicta monent magnis obsistere fluxa;
and if this conjecture is right, the moral of the Latin fable is not that it is useless to resist the great, but that the weak at times stand against the strong. Here too again there is some abruptness in the ending of the fable Motibus aura meis ludificata perit if vv. 19, 20 are withdrawn: an argument which applies even more forcibly to XXVII. 9, ro, which cannot possibly be wrenched away from their context. The fable, we may be sure, did not end with the abrupt statement

Nam breuis inmersis accrescens sponte lapillis
Potandi facilem praebuit unda uiam.
The metrical fault uolucris may easily be corrected by substituting cornix ; for I cannot believe that Avianus would have ended the first half of a pentameter with a short syllable.

On the other hand, $\mathrm{XXX} .{ }_{17}, 18$ are quite comparable with the Babrian interpolations : they spoil the effect of the fable, which otherwise ends with an epigrammatic question completely worthy both of Avianus and Babrius at their best. The same may be said of XLI. 17, 18: they are unnece-sary, the fable having already ended effectively with the declamatory

Infelix, quae magna sibi cognomina sumens

Ausa pharetratis nubibus ista loqui.
More puzzling are XXXVI. 17, 18. For not only is the curious assonance

Est hominum sors ista, magis felicibus ut mors Sit cita

alien to the sober style of Avianus, but the two vv. which precede them can hardly, in their existing form, have come from him: both the inversion grauis quamuis and the combination otia patiare abnormal.

In the Promythia I seem to detect a forger. Three of them are tetrastichs, and all contain the word allerizes. He would seem to have wished to leave his mark on the bastard children of his creation. The fourth is a distich, the Latin of which is faulty; either muneribus or dignas is strained.

The conclusion of the above cxamination is that the Epimythia in our Fables, though at times and to some extent questionable, are not, like those in Babrius, so decidedly inferior to the bulk of the work as to justify us in rejecting them altogether. In most cases they cannot well be removed without leaving a gap more or less perceptible. Yet, as they are sometimes combined with verses which from their peculiarity suggest a different authorship,-as, besides, three of the promythia point visibly to a self-conscious, self-betraying fabricator, and all of them are easily removable, it is more than probable that at some time after the life of Avianus a new editor revised the fables in accordance with the debased standard of his time, and with additions adapted to the increasing illiteracy of an age falling more and more into darkness.

The ground having thus been cleared of doubtful or spurious additions. We maty procest to judere the languare of the esembite remander. There is, I ludieve, conough of madeniable uniformity in this to justify a pronounced verdict.

Avianus himself says in his Preface that he had written in rude Latin (rudi latinitate). This is not the first impression to a modern reader. The general effect is a complex one: there is a blending of two quite distinct styles. The prevailing tone of the language is not only elaborately poctical, but specially Vergilian. Every fable has echoes or actual imitations of the Aeneid. Even where not distinctly modelled on Vergil, it is artificial and worked up ; in no sense rude or commonplace. And doubtless, had Avianus wished, he might have woven his fabric throughout on this model. But writing in an age when the Latin language was not only senescent, but visibly on its way to destruction, writing too on a subject which appealed to simple or childish understandings, one in which trees talk, beasts and men converse, birds dispute, fishes cry, he could not but adapt his language to suit in some degree both his subject and his hearers. Hence side by side with the prevailing poetical style of the fables is a style which breaks through it somewhat incongruously, in which the words belong to the decadent diction of the epoch, and the grammatical construction is allowed to follow the increasingly lax usage of popular speech. In proportion as this latter element asserts itself, the fables seem unfinished or even rude; and there are hardly any in which the mixture of the two kinds does not produce a constrained effect. In this respect Avianus is far below Babrius ; he has none of the playful grace of his Greek model. But it is more than probable that his very weakness is in part the cause of his popularity: the strange unclassical words and constructions are the signs of his sympathy with his time.

It is not necessary to speak at length of the former of these two elements of Avianus' style. It has much that is common with other poets of the same period, such as Claudian and Prudentius, or the somewhat later writers, Rutilius Namatianus and Maximianus. As compared with Ausonius, we are able to speak more definitely. The seventy-fifth epigram of Ausonius is a translation of the seventy-fifth Babrian fable:

Languentem Gaium moriturum dixerat olim Eunomus: euasit fati ope, non medici.
Paulo post ipsum uidet aut uidisse putauit Pallentem et multa mortis in effigie.
'Quis tu?' 'Gaius' ait, 'uiuisne?' hic abnuit, 'et quid Nunc agis hic ?' 'missu Ditis' ait 'uenio, Vt , qui notitiam rerumque hominumque tenerem, Accirem medicos.' Eunomus obriguit.
Tum Gaius 'metuas nihil, Eunome : dixi ego et omnes Nullum qui saperet dicere te medicum.'
Had Avianus translated Babrius in this style, we may feel sure he would long since have perished. With the exception of brevity (ten lines for Babrius' twenty) Ausonius' version has no merit at all. It fails to preserve any part of the charm of the original. The Latin, to be sure, is classical, but the rhythm is that of the Greek Anthology, sometimes as in v. 9 even beyond the Greek Anthology in licence. All the pentameters end in trisyllabic or quadrisyllabic words: $i$ is elided in fati ope, dixi ego et, twice in the compass of ten lines, and in the latter instance with a second elision in the same dactylic foot. Whereas Avianus has only allowed himself to elide $i$ five times in 642 lines fragili et, breui est, tibi est, fieri exstinctam, sibi abrupti, and of these five tibi, sibi are doubtfully long. The comparison is instructive: art has had a good deal to do in preserving our Fables from oblivion.

Other points of care there are in which Avianus contrasts favorably not only with Ausonius, but with Maximianus, approaching even Rutilius. For instance, the second foot of the hexameter is allowed to terminate on an elided syllable Dispar erat fragili et only once by Avianus in 642 vv ; whereas Ausonius in 634 elegiacs (Parentalia, Eclogae, Elegiacs to Theodosius, to the Reader, to Syagrius) has six such cases, Maximianus in 686 has 2; while Rutilius goes beyond the strictness of Avianus, and in 7 r 2 elegiacs has none.

In another point, again, which in an especial sense marks the poetry of the fourth century A.D., I mean the shortening of nominatives in ees, whether by writing them -is or simply allowing -es to count as a short syllable, a phenomenon which occurs five times in Ausonius (Thalĕs, bipĕs, trīĕs, quadrupěs, ederipěs), once in Maximianus (Vlissěs), more frequently in Prudentius, pubis, huis, famis (each twice), Ioannis (three times), prolis once, the fables of Avianus present only one, herers; mulpis is found as early as Phaedrus, and can hardly be counted as an example.

On the other hand the fourth century tendency to end the pentameter with a nomin. sing. parliciple, a departure from classical usage of the most marked kind, seems to be more affected by Avianus than by any writer of the fourth or fifth centuries. Claudian admits it very sparingly, Prudentius in his single Elegiac poem (Perist. xi) only three times in 123, Merobaudes only once (ortans) in 21 pentameters. Maximianus is freer: he has five instances in 343 pentameters, while Avianus in 32 I has twelve.

This, however, is a metrical digression. I return to the more marked features of Avianus' language, viewed on its distinctively poetical side.
A. The foltowing points are noticeable:
(I) Transformation of a sentence naturally expressed by a passive verb followed by an abl. to a nomin. with an active verb. The best instance is I. 6 Spem quoque raptori sustulit inde fames =spes raptori sublata est famis explendae. A less violent case is XV. in Quamuis innumerus plumas uariaucrit ordo $=$ quamuis innumero ordine uariatae sint plumae. Cf. XIX. 4. This transformation of a passive to an active construction, with its attendant change of subject, is not uncommon in Latin poetry. Propertius' adspergat tempora sudor for adsperganthur tempora sudore, Claudian's necdum festiuos regia cantus Sopierat for necdum in regia festiui cantus sopili crant, are typical instances ; but it is not so often that the new nominative is a mere state or quality.
(2) Tentative uses, in which the poet seems to be playing with languase, so that the words sugge: more than one meaning, according as they are taken in a classical or in a post-classical sense. This was possible when Latin words were pasang inte wholly new signifieations. It was, perhaps, connected with the tendency observable in some Christian writings, such as the letters of Ennodius and Sidonius, to use words with an esoteric or at least a non-natural meaning. To this class belong positi capilli X. I I, in the classical sense=placed on purpose ; later Latin 'artificial.'
tantorum XVIII, io, cl. 'so great': 1.1. 'so many.'
praesumptus wigor V. io, cl. 'assumed in advance': 1.1. 'presumed upon.'
fatigans XXXI. 7, cl. 'worrying' : 1.1. ' joking.' Cf. our 'bantering,' diurnus $\mathrm{XXXIII}, \mathbf{1}_{4}$, cl. ' of the day': 1.1 . nearly $=$ quotidianus.
(3) Affected uses of single words, but which are not unclassical-
e. g. mullus, where we should say ' never,' ' nowhere,' ' not at all,' VII. 3, XXVII. 5, XXXVI. 7, XL. 3, pecus of a single animal V. ı6, XXVIII. 4, semina of plants XII. 4, munera followed by a gen. of the thing offered XIV. 2, munera natorum, caespes =a tuft of roots XVI. 7, cf. XXI. 2, conuenire, 'to encounter,' 'cross the path' XVII. 15, IX. 6, onus used with slight if any meaning XX. 2, and in the odd combination auris omus XXX. 6, VIII. I2, difficilis 'intractable' XX. 14, datur is said III. 4, XXV. ro, breuis 'small' or 'scanty,' b. simia XIV. 9, unda XXVII. 7, cf. XXXIV. 6, XXXVIII. i2 (see Cannegieter's Discussion, pp. 314-315), moles of a heavy mist, m. nimborum XXIX. 3, pharetratus of the clouds charged with hail and rain XLI. r6, iubar of the peacock's sheeny tail XV. 8.
(4) Grecisms.
XXIV. ${ }_{5}$, 16 Tunc hominem aspiceres oppressum murmure magno, Conderet ut rabidis ultima fata genis.

XI. 9, io Illa timens, ne quid leuibus grauiora nocerent, Et quia nulla breui est cum meliore fides.
Here breui= $=\uparrow \hat{̣} \beta$ קах $\chi \in \hat{\epsilon}$.
B. I come to the second part of the subject, i. e. to those words, expressions, or combinations of words, which Avianus has admitted in his Fables not as poetical, but as part of the development of Latin in his own time. This point has been discussed but very partially by Unrein, and cursorily by Sittl.
r. Use of quoque. Av. delights in this adverb, and has introduced it in many of his fables, often in a lax or even weak way, e.g. XVIII. 5 Hos quoque collatis inter se cornibus ingens Dicitur in siluis pertimuisse leo, where it simply introduces a new statement about the oxen which are the subject of the fable, 'Besides.' See notes on XXXV. in, I. 6, IN. 2 r.
2. nimius $=$ strong, deep, nimiann sitim XXVII. 4, nimias aquas IV. 8, nimiae quieti I. 5, nimio igne IV. 12.
3. exosus 'hated' II. I3, XXXIII. 6. Found also in Macrobius.
4. discutere 'to examine' XIV. 8 : also in Symmachus. Av. also uses this verb in its literal sense, $d$. crines XXVIII. 14.
5. differre 'to disperse,' 'rout,' X. ro, XXXI. 8.
6. ferre iurgia 'to quarrel' XIII. 8, f. vulnuus 'to wound' XVII. II, but ferre rulnulus 'to be wounded' XX. 4.
7. relidere 'to dash' III, 2, X. ro. Unrein shows that Sallust ap, Serv, on Aen. iii. 4 I 4 used the word in his Historiae $=$ 'dash back': but as used by Av. it is unclassical.

8. referre twice in a doubtful meaning XXIII. I referens de marmore Bacchum, XXIX. 14 Siluarum referens optima quaeque dabat. No word is so common in $A v$. or other writers of the time. In the prose Panegyric of Merobaudes to Aetius, p. 10 N. two consecutive sentences end with this word in two wholly different significations. Iam considera, ductor inuicte, quanta libi haec agenti praemia debeantur, pro quibus mihi tanta sunt collata referenti. Tibi quidem nullum commune pracmium, nee par ceteris honor, aut laus aliqua usitata refercnda est.
9. recurrere nearly=redire VI. 3 .
10. dare uerba' to speak' IX. 20, XXIV. 1o, XXXVII. 2, XXXVIII. 6. Once only in its classical sense to deceive I. 14.
II. cupere 'to claim' or 'assert,' dॄเoûv, VH. I6, XXIV. I2.
12. defremere 'to cease raving' XXVIII. 4. The word is found in Plin. Epist. ix. I3, and is so printed by Keil, following the Medicean MS, but others give deferuissel. It is not till Sidonius that it comes into frequent use. (Unrein.)
13. tanta for tol X. 9 lantis milibus.
14. substantia 'property' XXXIV. I 7.

I5. prosus adj. 'direct,' 'straightforward,' proso tramile III. 8.
16. inmensus 'large,' 'full grown,' i.leonem XIII. r, i. iuuencis XVIII. I, i. aratro XXVIII. 5, where see note: and cf. C. Barth Aduers. xxxix. I3.

To these Unrein adds the following:-

1. dibilis XXXVIII. I I, debile uulgus, 'the ignoble rabble,' for which he says no instance can be found earlier than a law of King Childebert in the sixth century. I am inclined on other grounds to doubt the genuineness of this fable as a whole : not only debile, but laboratis in v. 7 , is suspicious.
2. resultans XXXIX. 13 , which Unr. interprets 'recusans': a sense which he states to be found first in the Letters of Sixtus (Xisur), Bishop of Rome, $8(\mathrm{Tom}$. L. p. 611 Migne), multus, 'uids salubribus constitutis, mullus pracceptionibus his resultet, ib. si huic uoluerit
 But in XXXIX. $\mathrm{I}_{3}$ this is not the meaning: see my note.
3. sperare $=$ rogare in two passages VIII. In Iuppiter arridens, postquam sperala negauil, XXII. 9 nam quae sperauerit unus. But in the former place sperata is simply 'his wish'; in the latter most of the MSS give nam quacque rogaueril, and either this, or, as I prefer, quae namque rogauerit is probably what Av. wrote.
4. Expositus in XXXVI. 4 Ferre nec expositis otia nosse iugis. Here Unr. explains expositis as=depositis; and it seems to be so used in Tertullian, Amolius, Lactantus. Cyprian. I'aulinus of Nola, and Dracontius. But in Av. XXXVI. 4 nothing proves this meaning: it may quite as naturally signify 'open' (so Withof), and refer to the hill-riders over which the seer left to itelfranges at liberts. Tun it is more than possible that cxpositis is a corruption of hace positis; see my note.
C. It remains to notice the peculiarities of syntax and construction in the Fables.
I. Use of quod with finite verb for infinitive.
I. r, 2 Rustica deflentem paruum iurauerat olim,

Ni taceat, rabido quod foret esca lupo.
XXXV. I Fama est quod geminum profundens simia natum Diuidat.
Dräger, Historische Syntax, ii. p. 225 , shows that this construction is observable in writers from the middle of the 2nd cent. onwards. Roby shows it is common in the Digest (Introd. to Dig. p. ccxvii). If the view of those who maintain that Av . wrote in the 5 th or 6 th century were true, it is wonderful that a phenomenon of such common occurrence at that time as this construction should occur so very rarely in the Fables. On the other hand nolo ut XXIX. 2 I seems to be unexampled.
2. Late use of participle in -dus, as a future passive participle. Non timor ex animo decutiendus erit XI. 12 .
3. Anomalous or anacoluthic constructions modelled on the language of the people. Of these there are two main types.
(a) II. I

Si quis eam uolucrum constituisset humi, Protinus e rubris conchas proferret harenis.
IX. 2-4

Cum socio quidam suscipiebat iter, Securus, quodcumque malum fortuna tulisset, Robore collato posset uterque pati.
Wopkens seems right in explaining these as a conversational change from oblique to direct narrative. The two subjunctives would be in orat. obliqua infinitives: but the normal grammar is violated, and the apodosis proceeds independently.
(b) Anacoluthic introduction of que or atque into two clauses, the first of which is connected with the second as nom. participle with finite verb.
XVII. 13 Illa gemens fractoque loqui uix murmure coepit.
XVI. II Stridula mox blando respondens canna susurro Seque magis tutam debilitate docet.
XXV. 5 Ille sibi abrupti fingens discrimina funis Atque auri queritur desiluisse cadum.
To this perhaps belongs the peculiar use of nec in XXXIV. 2
Quisquis torpentem passus transisse iuventam
Nec timuit uitae prouidus ante mala, for it seems improbable that Av. has here used passus=passus est.

THE MSS OF AVIANUS.

The MSS of Avianus are numerous and to be found in every part of Europe. The Fables were much read in the Middle Age, and scholia of varying extent and goodness are extant in most of them.

Both Fröhner＇s $C$ as well as the Trèves codex have short glosses superscribed or in the margin．Those in C I had originally intended to publish：but on examination rejected as too trivial．The glosses in $T$ are valuable and have been，with one or two exceptions，inserted in the Commentary：

Fröhner has published（pp．67－84 of his edition）from two Paris MISS $\left(347^{b} 347^{\mathrm{c}}\right)$ a prose paraphase of the Fables，of uncertain date．It can hardly however be early，as it contains some of the spurious epimythia，besides additions not known to the uninterpolated MSS．For this reason I have not printed it，though its interpretations are usually sound，and occasionally merit quoting．

The MSS which I have used may conveniently be grouped by their localc．

1．The Paris codices，$A=8093, C=5570, P=13206$ ，first $e^{x}$－ amined by Fröhner（1862）．Fröhner considers $A$ and $P$ to have been written in the first half，$C$ towards the close of century ix．Bährens assigns $C$ to century xi．lirom a careful examination which I made of it for some months in the Bodleian，I believe that it cannot be later than century $x$ ．It is in my opinion the best of the three laris codices，although both $A$ and $P$ seem to be earlier．I have used Fröhners＇collation of $A$ and $P$ ，checking it in some points where 1 was in doubt by personal inspection．A full description of all three will be found in Frölmer＇s ed．pp．i－vii．

2．The Osford codices $O=$ Auct．F．2．if．$R=B$ ．N．Rawl．ini， $X=$ Auct． F .5 .6 ，first examined by myself for the present edition． Of these the oldest is $U$ ，a MLS of century xt ．Where the manus frima can be ascertained，$O$ is of value；but some centuries after it was written a later hand made many crasures and corrections，all of which are wrong．It is in consequence of less importance than either $l \mathcal{l}$（of century XI－XiI）or $I$（circ． 1300 ）．$R$ is a very good，completely trustworthy，MS：$X$ is chiefly valuable for occasional variants which point to the true reading．
$\therefore$ The Cambridge codices，$G$（Gale O．3．5，in the Library of Trinity College，of century xir）and the two Peterhouse，$P_{c} t^{1} P_{c t^{2}}$ ．
$G$ was collated for Bahrens by H．A．J．Munro．It was examined by Bentley．It has special variants which are interesting，but not certainly right．I quote these from Bährens＇edition（P．L．M．v． 30 $\therefore 19$.
$P e f^{1}$（t in James＇Catalogue）is imperfect，the leaves containing Av： I－XXII having been torn out．The fables are followed by the Elegies of Naximianus．
$P_{i}{ }^{2}$（James 25 ）contains all Avianus，with Naximianus．These two MSS perhaps are of century xili－xiv．

4．The British Museum codices．I have examined five，and col－ lated four of these $\left(B, b, b^{2}, b^{3}\right)$ ．The fifth Reg．${ }^{1} 5$ A．V1I．is cited on ズオ犬Iス．ıi．
$B=$ Harl． $49^{6} 7$ ．A MS of unique importance，though not written （so Mr．E．M．Thompson believes）much before $\mathbf{1 3 0 0}$ ．＇The m．prima may generally be made out，in spite of the many corrections and addi－ tions added subsequently. I consider it the most interesting of the new MISS which I have collated. It has no Praefatio. In one case the normal arrangement of the Fables is disturbed; IV precedes III.
$b=2 \mathrm{I}, 2 \mathrm{I} 3$ (century xiri) of secondary importance, and often interpolated.
$b^{2}=1_{5}$ A. XXXI (circ. 1300) uninterpolated, and worth consideration, but imperfect, omitting XVII, XVIII, XIX, XX, XXI.
$b^{3}=10090$, interpolated. I only quote it occasionally.
5. T. Trèves 1464 , of century $x$. This codex, an enormous folio, containing also Prudentius, is one of the best sources of the text. The short scholia are excellent and may come down from an early period. I collated it in the Bodleian.
6. S. St. Gallen, 1396 , a fragment of century xi. It contains XXI. m-13, XXII, XLI. $\mathbf{1}^{3}$-XLII. 16 . I collated it at St. Gallen.
7. $K$, a Carlsruhe fragment ( 85 in the Hof Bibliothek) which Fröhner assigns to century rx. It contains XXXIV. 8-XL. 9 .

On these I have based my text. I have not seen either of the Vossian MSS at Leyden, and wherever they are quoted, cite from Bährens who describes them thus: 'Voss. L. Q. 86 saec. ix. est Lachmanni antiquissimus' 'Voss. L. O. 15, saec. xi:' nor the Ashburnham (Libri ${ }^{181} \mathrm{I}_{3}$ ) of cent. xY-xir. Nor can I profess to give much weight to the reported readings of a 'codex uetustissimus' reprinted from the papers of a Danish clergyman named Cabeljau by Cannegieter in D'Orville's Miscellanea Noua for 1734 : still less to reconstitute the orthography of Avianus on so precarious a foundation. (See Fröhner's Praef. p. ix, Bährens P. L. M. v. p. 32.)

A fable-writer speaks freely, because he is not bound by the rules of strict truth. His vehicle is fiction, and he moves in it at will. This is the meaning, I believe, of the 'free Muse' which Babrius Praef. i. 15, 16 ascribes to Aesop, rather than 'prose' as opposed to 'poetry' (Rutherford). Lachmann's seueritatis is plausible, but not necessary. Cf, however Sen. Barth Aduersar. xix. 24 objected to this as not sufficiently antithetic to Graeca eruditione, and conjectured latina arte. His criticism finds some support in a Vienna MS quoted by Schenkl (Österr. retain constructing it with eruditione. Yet there seems to be nothing forced in saying that Theodosius was superior to the Athenians in knowledge of Greek, and to the Romans in command of pure Latin. latinitas is thus used by Cic. In the Phaedo (60) Socrates says that at the suggestion of a haunting dream he had translated such of the Aesopian fables as he knew into verse; but Av. probably alludes to the apologues, in the style of fables, which from time to time are found in the Platonic dialogues, c.g. of Pain and Pleasure having two heads growing out of one stem (Phacd. 60), of the Grasshoppers (Phaedr. 259), of Plenty and Poverty (Symp. 203), of Prometheus and Epimetheus (Protag. 320). The only other sense it could have, 'open to the use of all,' i. e. which any fable-writer might use as common property, might be supported by Horace's Difficile est proprie communia dicere (A. P. 128).

Macrobius says, S. v. 17. 5, the story of Dido is treated so wonderfully by Vergil that artists of all kinds, tamquam unico argumento decoris utantur, the one best subject in which they can exhibit their artistic powers. In this sense it nearly=our 'illustration.' iambis, choliambics or scazons. Babrius speaks of his own $\pi \iota \kappa \rho \bar{\omega} \nu$ iá $\mu \beta \omega \nu$, i. Praef. 19. Babrius. A Roman name, not a Greek, as Otto Crusius shows de Babrii aetate, pp. 189-191. It is found several times in inscriptions. The conclusion of Crusius that the author of two books, the latter imperfect, of fables in Greek scazons, which were first published by Boissonade in 1844 from a codex in the monastery of Laura on Mount Athos, discovered by a Greek named Minoides Menas (Rutherford, p. Ixvii), was a Roman who wrote in Greek, modifying his diction by Latin idioms, is, if not demonstrated, at least very probable. 13. coartauit, 'abridged' or 'reduced:' the opposite of resoluit, 'expanded.' 14. quinque. This is the number as stated in the colophon at the end of the now destroyed Reims MS (Hervieux, Phaedrus p. xliv). The whole number of Phaedrus' fables is 93 (as given by Orelli and Hervieux), a smaller total than the Babrian collection even in its imperfect extant form. Hence resoluit would seem to refer more particularly to the distribution into a number of separate books which Phaedrus adopted. That the books were short is perhaps indicated by libellos. 15. in unum redactas. In the same way as Varro and Vegetius use in libros redigere. Macrob. He speaks with the modesty of an unfledged author. To judge truly of the style of Avianus we have only to compare him with Ausonius' version of Babrius lxxv. (Auson. Epig. 75). I cannot agree with O. Crusius and Schwabe, who explain rudi latinitate conpositas of the prose version of Iulius Titianus (de Aet. Babrii p. 238, Teuffel-Schwabe Geschichte d. Röm. 1. deflentem paruum. I retain this, the reading of the Paris MSS APC against deffenti paruo of the rest as palpably the original and earlier tradition, of which the dative is a later alteration caused by the difficulty of finding a construction. The first form of the sentence would be Rustica deflentem praruum iurauerat escam fore; the intervening clause Ni taceat gives occasion for a change to the other construction of iurare with quod which is found in the Historia Augusta (Dräger ii. p. 225) and elsewhere, e.g. Macrob. S. vii. 3. I2 iuraucrat quod eum passurus esset. So polliceri quod in the immediately following sentence of Nacrobius. The construction would thus resemble that of facere, efficere with an accus, followed by an ut clause which is common enough in Plautus and belongs to the language of common life. paruum=puerum Prud. Perist. $\mathrm{x}, 716$ Sitire sese paruus exclamauerat and elsewhere. iurauerat = Babrius' $\eta \pi \epsilon i \lambda \eta \sigma \epsilon_{0}$. The emendation iurgauerat, cf. iurgia (v. I4), is tempting, but iurgare does not seem to be constructed with an accus. olim, 'once on a time' = the recurring $\pi$ oтé of Babrius and the Aesopic fables. 2. foret for futurus esset would seem to be part of the Latinity of the Decadence. Amm. Marc. xxiv. 4.24 cum se ultro offerret, si miles fuisset memorabilis conscius facti=oblaturus esset; xxii. 6. 2 pollicitus quod ipse quoque protinus ueniret = uenturus esset. In foret the form itself is future, cf. fore. 3. ipsas Ante fores, 'close before the door,' like Vergil's Vestibulum ante ipsum. 4. irrita uota gerens, gerere like curam gerere and with little, if any, more special meaning. . 5. nimiae, 'overpowering,' 'deep.' Very common in this sense in Ammianus Marcellinus and the writers of the Decadence. It seems to have belonged to the language of common life; hence its occurring in the uncouth Latin of the Christian Acts of Martyrs. Thus twice in the Passio Sanctorum Quattuor Coronatorum, p. ro ed. Wattenbach cum nimio desiderio requireret, p. I3 Diocletianus iratus est uebementer et nimio furore plenus dixit. This seems to have lasted on from the time of Plautus: see Ramsay's Mostellaria Excursus xii. 6. Wopkens' emendation Spen quoque raptoris sustulit inde fami is accepted by Lachmann and does little violence to MSS 'and besides by so doing (inde) robbed the famishing plunderer of his last hope.' So Macrob. S. vii. I. I3 Hoc commento spem detraxit insidiantilus regnantis quieti. The MS reading Spem quoque raptori sustulit inde fames may be defended, as a poetical transference by which the wolf's despair of satisfying his hunger is clecribed as humer making the woll derpar hy mot being sath-fied. This is only an extension of a use common enough in Latin poetry. So Propertius says aspergat tenipora sudor for aspergantur tempora sudore ii. 24. 3; sinus condit murmura Ioniae aquae for sinu conduntur m. I. a. (Postgate on Prop. iv. 6. 16). Valerius Flaccus motis seu uos uia flatibus urguet for motis flatibus ad uiam urguemini iii. 624. Vergil ni cursus in altum Vela uocet for uela uocentur ut cursum faciant in altum Aen. iii. 454. Claudian Laud. Stil. i. 3 Conubii necdum festiuos regia cantus Sopierat. raptori, Aen. ii. 355 lupi ceu Raptores. 9,10 . The reading here is very doubtful. It is hardly probable that Avianus would have admitted referis as a form of refers, and impossible that réfers should stand as a spondee, as Schenkl suggested. Referes the reading of $A$ seems to point to referens which is actually found in the Galeanus. If this is adopted, sed trabis must be a corruption either of sic trabis (Bährens) or possibly of attrabis. Avianus is fond of this construction of participle in the hexameter followed by final verb in the pentameter, iii. 7, 8; v. II, I2; vi. 3,4 ; vii. 5,6 , and passim. 9. referens, 'bringing home.' 10. The emaciated cheeks draw in (trabunt) the features of the wolf, giving them a pinched and sickly appearance. consumptis, by starvation. ora, possibly 'jaws,' in the narrowersense of 'mouth,' rather than 'features.' 12. uix, ' with difficulty skulked pitiably away and took nothing.' uacua, not the same as uana, but empty of prey: as Catullus speaks of Penios coming non uacuos lxiv. 288. 13. rogas, 'Can you ask ?' as often in Plautus, rogo of some MSS might be supported by such passages as Salvian. de Gub. Dei i. § 10 Et quae, rogo, insania est aut quae caecitas, $u t$ egestuosa ac mendicante re publica diuitias posse credant stare priuatas? vii. §222 Et quae nobis, rogo, spes ante Deum est? vii. § 260 Et quae esse, rogo, Romano statui spes potest? Indeed the formula is of constant recurrence in this writer. 14. Iurgia, the scolding words addrest by the nurse to the child. Ovid Met. iii. 261, 2 tum linguam ad iurgia soluit. Profeci quid enim totiens per iurgia? dixit. uerba darent, 'deceived.' Ovid Trist.ii. 500 Verbaque dat stulto callida nupta uiro. Elsewhere Av. uses uerba dare= loqui, in which sense it is hardly classical. 15. arte, which Withof criticised as unmeaning, is probably here 'lesson,' 'teaching.' Manuals of instruction in Grammar, Rhetoric, etc. were called Artes, and from this 'sense the word would naturally come to mean 'primer,' so 'lesson.' This seems more probable than to explain arte of the artifice of the nurse, which is a censure on over credulity. Arte would thus nearly = story of the artifice. notari, 'is marked for reprobation.' Ovid Trist. ii. 7 Carmina fecerunt ut me moresque notaret Iam pridem inuisa Caesar ab Arte meos. 16.
 Two of the prose versions given are more general ; the wolf says ${ }^{\epsilon} \nu$ is that men's words do not agree with their acts. This is perhaps the older application of the fable; the special reference to women belongs to a period when their position was more established and gave them a formidable power in the world of intrigue. esse, 'has an existence.' Ovid Am. iii. 3. I Esse deos, i crede. Stat. S. i. 4. I Estis io Superi. Val. Fl. v. 645 Est bonor bis etiam suus, est.

Babr. II5, Fab. Aesop. 419 Halm.

This fable existed in no less than three poetical Greek versions, the Babrian, an iambic version of which one line and a half are preserved by Suidas s. v. N $\hat{v} v$ $\sigma \omega \theta \in i \eta \nu$, and another in hexameters, of which four and a half lines are also extant in Suidas s. v. $\mu \in \tau a \chi \rho o \nu i \eta \nu, \sigma \tau v \phi \in \lambda \bar{\omega} \nu$, oï $\tau, \sigma \kappa \omega \hat{\omega} \lambda o \nu$. They are quoted at length by Rutherford, pp. xxi, xxii. The fact of the tortoise promising to repay the bird that lifted it into air with jewels from the Erythraean Sca points, I think, to India as the original home of the fable. Phaedrus has a somewhat similar fable II. 7 (6) in which an eagle that has carried off a tortoise into the sky is instructed by a crow to dash it down upon a rock in order to get at the flesh inside, and the meal is then shared between the two birds.

1. testudǒ, so barundŏ, xvi. 8. 2. This line is full of perplexities: (i) eam where correct Latin required se; (2) uolucrum after quis ; (3) the over compression of meaning in constituisset bumi, which must signify ' had after a flight through air set her safe on the ground.' But (r) the change of the reflexive to the demonstrative pronoun, perhaps for clearness, is quite common even in Caesar, Livy, and Tacitus (Dräger i. pp. 58, 59), and cannot raise any difficulty in the later Latin of Avianus. (2) Volucris is masc, in the hexameter translation of the Homeric prodigy Il. ii. 299 sqq. which Cicero has introduced in the second book of his de Diuinatione (ii. 30. 64) tam teneros uolucris matremque peremit, and in Corippus laud. Iustini i. 199 (Neue i. 634), but not elsewhere (Avianus himself expressly makes it fem. XV. r, XXXIII.3); and here the indeterminateness of the genitive, si quis wolucrum not si qui uolucris, as well as the fact of quis being sometimes used of feminines (Cannegieter) takes from the harshness of the combination. (3) might be got over by reading with the Galeanus and $B$, two good MSS, destituisset, 'had set firmly down,' cf. Plaut. Rud. iii. 5. 43, C. Gracchus ap. Gell. x. 3, Livy ii. 12, vii. 10, xxiii. 10, xxvii. 15, where destituere is an emphasized statuere, nearly = defigere: see Lipsius Epistol. Quaest. iv. Io and cf. Hildebrand on Apul. M. ii. 25. Another possibility would be to read uolucrem with $P$ and the corrector of $A$, which would express Babrius' some high elevation, as opposed to the low levels on which the tortoise ordinarily moved. For uolucrem thus used predicatively cf. Cic. Tusc. Disp. v. 13. 38 alias bestias nantes aquarum incolas natura esse uoluit, alias uolucres caelo frui libero. I do not think Lachmann is right in considering $\dot{\eta} \kappa \epsilon \iota$. [Withof's ingenious restituisset bumo has some support from one of the Oxford MSS which has bumo.] 3. Guiet and Wopkens rightly explain this as loose Latin (genus loquendi barbarum, Guiet), for protinus se prolaturam esse concbas, comparing 1X. 2 Securus, quodcumque malum fortuna tulisset, Robore collato posset uterque pati. A close parallel is Plaut. Merc. iii. 1. 38 Inter nos coniurauimus nisi cum illo ego et ille mecum, Neuter stupri causa caput limaret, quoted by Dräger i. p. 242. rubris, of the Erythraean Sea. Tib. ii. 4. 30 e rubro lucida concba mari. iv. 2. 29 Et quascumque niger rubro de litore conchas Proximus Eois colligit Indus aquis. Prop, iii. I 3.6 Et uenit e rubro concba Erycina salo.
2. pretium, 'value,' cf. in pretio esse and Ovid Pont. iv. 8. 68 Iudicio pretium res babet ista tuo. cortice, the exterior coating or surface of the pearl. baca=margarita from its globulous bead-like shape. Cul. 67 nec Indi Conchea baca maris pretio est. Pers, ii. 66 Haec bacam conchae rasisse . . .iussit. 5. Indignum, sc. esse, 'it was an outrage to her nature that with all her diligence her slow pace kept her from doing or effecting anything in the whole course of the day.' So I read with the earliest MSS. Indignum as an exclamation'shame!' and indignum est are both Ovidian (Am. i. 6. r, ro. 53). Most edd. prefer the other reading Indignans, which certainly gives more meaning to sibimet. 6. 'Non praetulerim proficeretque, obtinente codicum parte maiori, in quibus perficeretque. Tali synonymia Salvian. G. D. p. Iro [iv. 42 Pauly] nullus ad boc tam bebes, qui ad boc aliquid agat atque perficiat, ut perfecta non curet. Sallustius in Cic. $ 6 Egeris, oro te, Cicero, perfeceris, quod libet. Componatur Cicero Academ. ii. 7. 22 quarum (artium) omne opus est in faciendo atque agendo. Arnobius i. frag. 21 (c. 37) quae fecerint egerint pertulerint actiturint. Vopiscus in Aureliano cap. vi si forte quaereretur, quis Aurelianus aliquid uel fecisset uel gessisset.' Wopkens. 7. promissis implet, 'loads with promises,' much as Ovid uses Hanc imple meritis, load with services, ingratiate yourself by a multitude of services, Am. ii. 3. II. 8. Perhaps an imitation of Propertius iii. 13. 66 Experta est ueros irrita lingua deos. similem fidem, a return of treachery. 9. male mercatis, 'ill-bought,' i.e. dearly. mercatus as a passive participle is not very common, Prop. i. 2. 5. 10. Occidit. Bährens is perhaps right in conjecturing Excidit, for not only Babrius but the prose version represents the eagle as letting the tortoise fall upon a rock which broke its shell. MSS have Occidit which ought to mean that the eagle tore open the tortoise with its talons (ungue fero). If Av. meant simply that the tortoise was smashed to pieces by the eagle's cruelly dropping him, he would hardly have used words which suggest a different idea. 11. sublimis, either nominative as Met. iv. 72 I modo se sublimis in auras Tollit or, as is perhaps more probable from the variant sublimes, accus. plural.

 auras with Ingemuit. 13. exosae quieti does not mean that the tortoise chafed at its own enforced slowness of progression almost $=$ 'discontented inaction,' but 'disagreeable,' or 'surly.' This agrees with the character of the tortoise as drawn by Rose's Physiognonomist p. 167 Testudo animal quod neque sibi aliquid neque cuiquam alteri prodest, as well as with Seneca's gibes at the otiosus and his witty comparison of him to a worm, Ep. 87. I9 ne quietem quidem et molestia uacare bonum dicam: quid est otiosius uerme? Exosus as a passive is very rare, but occurs in Macrob.S. i. It. 45 dis exosos, and again infra XXXIII. 6. post haec, 'thenceforward,' so XXV. 15, XLI. 17. 14. 'That only the supremest effort climbs to greatness.' 15,16 . This epimythion is singularly flat after the former moral in 13, 14. It is found, however, in all the best MSS, and seems to be part of the earliest tradition we possess of the fables. As Cannegieter points out, meliora in Avianus has the special sense of something higher in position, XI. Io Et quia nulla breui est cum meliore fides, of the uncertain friendship between the powerful and the weak.

1. Curua $=\lambda_{0} \xi^{\prime}$ of Babrius and the prose versions. In better Latin it would have been obliqua, cf. Macrob. S. i. 17. 63 Cancer animal retro atque oblique cedit. ib, 21. 23 Cancer obliquo gressu. retro cedens. Vegetius uses the word of rams iv. It more arietum retro cedit. Macrobius expresses the same idea by retrorsum recedere Sat. vii. 9. 3. 2. Hispida, 'scaly.' Plin. ix. 9 squamis bispido corpore. saxosis aquis, a harsh expression for saxis quibus aquae abundabant. relisit, a rare word, used again IX. xо sponte relisus bumi, 'dashing on the ground.' Here it $=\pi \rho \sigma \sigma \tau \rho i \beta \epsilon \iota \nu$ ( тès $\pi \lambda \epsilon v \rho a ́ s)$ of the Bodleian Paraphrast. Unrein, p. 41, cites Prud. x. 47 inque ora tabellas Frangunt: relisa fronte lignum dissilit, where the meaning is that the boy-pupils of Cassianus dash their tablets in his face, and then the wood striking against the Martyr's forehead splits asunder. 3. procedere C, praecedere most of the other MSS. The latter would not be without a meaning, as the mother-crab would then be represented as trying to make her child take up the position of guide which she herself would naturally assume, and is asked to assume in V.9. But procedere is simpler and more direct; and the authority of $C$ is sufficient to outweigh the other MSS. 4. praemonuisse of MSS is suspicious, as the advice comes after the injury has been done. The form of $\overline{\mathrm{P}}$ (prae) is so close to one form of E as to suggest that Av. wrote emonuisse, though this is a very rare word: and Cannegieter's statement that one of his codices gave semonuisse is a practical confirmation of this view. Cic. Fam. i. 7.9 Te uero emoneo tum bencficiis tuis, tum amore incitatus tuo. datur, ' is said,' again XV. iо, XXV. iо. Da for dic is not uncommon: but the passive use of datur $=$ dicitur is rare ; Forc. quotes Ovid F. vi. 433, 4 Seu genus Adrasti, seu furtis aptus Ulixes, Seu pius Aeneas eripuisse datur. Stat. Theb. vii. 315 Asopos genuisse datur. Claud. Rapt. Pros. iii. 337 Captiuamque pater post proelia praedam Aduexisse datur. 5. transuerso $=$ transuersim eunti. Cannegieter quotes a line of Plautus' Pseudulus (iv. 1. 45), ap. Varro L. L. vii. 8 i l't tronsuersus, non prouersus cedit quasi concor solet. laaee deuia, sidelong courses or swervings from the straight road. 6. 'And think not to move backwards slantwise upon your fect.' There is no difiiculty in the words in obliquos pedes, which well describe the drawing of the body backwards upon the feet. Rursus seems to be here for retrorsus, a sense justified and determined by pro(r)so in 8 Rursum prorsum are correlatives like sursum deorsum (Non. 384). uelĭs occurs again XXIII. ro Seu uelis esse deum, and may, I think, be accepted as a licence Av. permitted himself. So in the poem addrest by Flavius Felix to Victorinianus Master of the Rolls (primiscriniarius), probably a contemporary of sidonius (A. L. 254. 40 Riese) Clericus ut fiam, dum uelis ipse, potes. 7. Wopkens can hardly be right in explaining these verses as a general reflection; they would then have been introduced by Nam, nor would stultum have been enforced by nimis, which gives the remark a sort of personal character. 11. tu, the parent crab. prauissima temptes is an infelicitous piece of language, quite unworthy of Av. 12. censor, 'critic.' There is a passage in the Saturnalia of Macrobius, to whom Avianus is believed to have dedicated his work, which is a curious parallel to the introduction in $\mathrm{I}-2$ of the stars in conjunction with Jupiter. After quoting the three lines of II. i. in which Zeus is said to have gone to the blameless Aethiopians with all the gods following in his train ( $423-425$ ), Macrobius ad occasus ortusque cotidiano impetu caeli feruntur eodemque aluntur umore.

1, 2 are full of difficulty, perhaps corrupt. The general meaning is however clear. The north wind and the sun dispute before the assembled powers of the sky (praesentia numina 15) which is the more powerful, and decide the question by each attempting to make a traveller strip off his pallium. The tribunal consists of the stars (ad sidera) and Jupiter, who seems to be thought of as presiding judge. Possibly then cum magno Ioue in 2 is to be constructed closely with ad sidera, 'before the stars with supreme Jupiter as arbiter.' The order of the words however is against this; and it seems safer to explain that the two claimants dispute with Jupiter in presence of the stars. Each contests with Jupiter the superiority of his claim. [G. Murray's conj. Inmitis Boreas rapit usque ad sidera Phoebum: Iurgia cum magno conseruere Ioue is ingenious, but usque ad sidera, a Vergilian expression, Ecl. v. 43 binc usque ad sidera notus, would be somewhat of an exaggeration, except perhaps as implying the violent determination of Boreas to settle the question.] 1. Inmitis. Verg. G. i. 370 Boreaede parte trucis. placidusque is an antithesisto inmitis. the fable turns on the contrast of the two forces, violence and gentleness. ad sidera, a juristic use of ad, ad censores dicere Tusc. 2. Iurgia conserere, which is found in Auson. Perioch. Odys. 18, like iurgia nectere Ovid Am. ii. 2. 35, followed by cum and abl. must mean to quarrel with. 3. Quis = uter, as several times in Phaedrus, i. 26 (24); 8, iv. 24. 3 (Cannegieter). inceptum peragat, 'effect his purpose,' Vergilian, Aen. iv. 452. mediumque. 'And at the moment, a traveller happened to be wending his way along a plain.' que expresses the simultaneousness of the quarrel with the opportunity chance offered of deciding it by a practical trial. So in the well-known line of Ennius Dono ducite, doque uolentibus cum magnis dis, the actual making over of the thing given follows immediately on the promise to give it. Aen. x. 825 Arma quibus laetatus babe tua, teque parentum Manibus et cineri siqua est ea cura renitto. Pallia decutienda, object accus. in apposition with causam. 'The stripping off of the man'souter garment.' See Dräger ii. 794. nudato expresses the result of the stripping, viz. leaving him lightly clad. 7. inpulsus uentis, 'with the shock of the winds' = inpulsu uentorum. Apuleius de Mundo xii Procellosus flatus Cataegis dicitur, quem praefractum possumus dicere, uentus qui de superiore caeli parte summissus inferiora repentinis inpulsibus quatiat. 8. depluere with an accus, is found in our MSS of Prop, ii. 20. 8 Sollicito lacrimas depluit a Sipylo, but lacrimans is a plausible conjecture. 9. magis is to be constructed closely with quod, ' the more that.' duplicem possibly expresses part of the man's action, as if it were duplicatum, 'folding his cloak double 'as the wind increases in intensity. Against this is the Vergilian duplicem ex umeris reiecit amictum Aen. v. 42 I, and the words of Cornelius Nepos Datam. 3 agresti duplici amiculo circumdatus, from which it would seem that a double-folded amictus was a regular part of the countryman's equipment against foul weather. Fröhner's prose paraphrast has quanto tempestas acrior insurrexit, tanto uiator circa se uestes suas attentius colligebat. 10. summotos trahit, 'pushes rudely aside and tugs at the folds.' quod $C$, quo $O$ and $R$, my two best Bodleian MSS. This may be right, cf. Liv. i. 25 . ${ }^{2} 3$ co maiore cum gaudio, quo prope metum res fuerat (Dräger ii, 627). 11.
tenues, not 'slight' or 'fecble' as opposed to their subsequently increasedi heat, but 'penetrating' i.c. gradually pervading the pores of the body and making it by degrees warmer and warmer. increscere, 'grew more powerful' nearly = inualescere, with which it is combined in the Digest. Macrob. S. i. 21. 17 solis uis prima parte diei ad meridiem increscit . . . mox elanguescens deducitur.
12. surgeret MSS, which Wopkens altered to spargeret from not understanding the force of iubar. Isidor. Orig. iii. 70. I8 Sed et splendor solis ac lunae et stellarum iubar uocatur, quod in modum iubae radii ipsortm extendantur. In the Treves MS of the Fables iubar is glossed by splendor. Here then iubar is the full brightness of the sun which concentrating by degrees its rays is properly said to rise (surgeret), its orb having been before obscured and only now coming into view ; or we might explain surgeret in relation to nimio igne as Ovid says ut solet adfuso surgere flamma mero (Her. xiii. 114 quoted by Wopkens' Reviewer p. 428), cf. Auson. Mosel. 16, 17 Sed liquidum iubar et rutilam uisentibus aethram Libera perspicui non inuidet aura diei. Amm. Marc. xxviii. 4. I2 nondum solis puro iubare (iuuare Nissen's Fragm. Marburg. p. 5). 13. requiescere, active as in Verg. Ecl. viii. 4, Ciris 232, Prop. ii. 29. 75, and the fragm. of Calvus' Io quoted by Servius on Ecl. viii. 4. 15. praesentia, assembled to witness. numina, the stars and Jupiter. See the passage of Macrobius quoted in the introduction. 16. praemissis, a military word, used of despatching troops in advance. Veg. iii. 22 leuis armatura praemittebatur, 79 loca praemissis praesidiis occupanda, hence uincere, as any army might. It is useless for securing victory to open the campaign with threats.

This fable is not in our Babrius. It is preserved however in three prose versions of which the nearest to the outline of Avianus is as follows. It will be found in Lucian's Piscatores c. 32.

1-4. The Promythion is not required, and is probably not by Av. 1. Modelled on Horace Epist. i. 7. 98 Metiri se quemque suo modulo ac pede uerum est. The Christian writer Ennodius (fifth century) several times uses metiri se in his Epistles, as Hartel shows in his Index s.v. Ep. ix. I Tu te ut metiaris inploro. iii. 17 Numquam se metitur quen stimulat caritatis imperium. iuuari, 'to find a satisfaction in,' nearly $=$ to be contented. Barth Aduers, xxxix. 7. In this sense the passive is not very common. Cic. Orator xlviii. 159 refer ad auris, probabunt: quaere cur ita sit : dicent ituari: uoluptati autem aurium morigerari debet oratio, where I cannot think iuuare is rightly introduced by Sandys from Gellius ii. 17. Ovid Pont. ii. 7. 71 Temperie cali corpusque animusque iutuatur, where iunatur corresponds to dulce est 69 , uoluptas 73. 2. ferre sibi, 'to claim as one's own.' Barth illustrates from Ovid M. xiii. 383 fortisque uiri tulit arma disertus. Ferre in the Latin of some writers of the Decadence so completely = auferve as to be constructed with a dat. of the person robbed: for which see Pauly's index to Salvianus, and cf. Roby Introd. to Digest p. 79. 3. miracula, 'finery,' ' gauds,' lit. objects of false admiration. So in a letter of Symmachus to the Emperor Theodosius I in which he asks leave to return to the simpler conveyance which antiquity assigned to the Prefect of the City, and deprecates the grander and more cumbrous vehicle which later fashion had introduced, he says: Absit ut moderator urbis liberae atque adeo deuotae tamquam Salmoneus alius inuebatur. nibil moramur externa miracula x. 24. In Phaedrus i. II. 6-9 bic auritulus Clamorem subito totis tollit uiribus Nouoque turbat bestias miraculo, the word is used of the prodigious or portentous noise raised by the ass imitating the lion. And so here miracula might express the phenomenal look of the lion's skin on the ass's body, with which cf. Vergil's Omnia transformat sese in miracula rerum (G. iv. 44I).

faciant risum, like the jackdaw stript of his borrowed plumes, Hor. Epist. i. 3. I9 ne si repetitum uenerit olim Grex auium plumas, moneat cornicula risum Furtiuis nudata coloribus. 4. 'When once he finds himself left in forlorn possession of his native deficiencies.' remanere aptly expresses the poor residuum left behind when adventicious merits are stript away, and the individual is left in puris naturalibus. Sen. Ep. i. 5 Non enim tantum minimum in imo sed pessimum remanet. malis, here 'defects,' 'imperfections,' opposite of bona as used in the Propertian Nec sinere in propriis membra nitere bonis i. 2. 6 (Cannegieter). Exuuias. Aen. ix. 306 pellem borrentisque leonis Exuuias. Gaetuli, as Africa is the natural home of lions (leonum arida nutrix Hor. C. i. 22. 15). 6. spoliis. Her. ix. II3 Falleris et nescis: non sunt spolia ista leonis, Sed tua; tuque feri uictor es, illa tui, of Omphale wearing the lion's skin of Hercules. 7. incongrua, 'ill-suited,' 'unsuitable.' Paucker Supplem. Lexic. Latinor. p. 365 quotes it from Apuleius, Symmachus, Vegetius, Jerome, Rufinus, Boethius and others. Veg. ii. 19 incongruum uideretur imperatoris militem, qui ueste et annona publica pascebatur, utilitatibus zuacare priuatis. 8. miserum, 'sorry,' 'ignoble.' tanto honore, of the majestic appearance of the lion. Aen. viii. 617 deae donis et tanto laetus bonore, as explained by Wagner. 9. mimo, Cannegieter's conj. for animo of MSS is more than probable, as the words are often confounded in MSS, and it was the special function of the mimus to personate characters, Amm. Marc. xxiii. 5 cum Antiochiae scaenicis ludis mimus cum uxore inmissus e medio sumpta quaedam imitaretur. Petron. S. 80 Grex agit in scaena mimum . . . Mox . . . Vera redit facies, adsimulata perit. Besides, the bare feet of the mime-actor (Diomedes iii. 490 K. Quarta est species planipedis, qui Gracce dicitur uímos, ideo autem Latine planipes dictus, quod actores planis pedibus, id est nudis, in proscaenium introirent, non ut tragici actores cum cotburnis, neque ut comici cum soccis) would excellently suit the ass of the fable, whose feet would not be covered by the lion's skin but be exposed to view. Similarly in a wolf's skin to escape detection as a spy. [limbo, my own conj., would refer to the mane of the lion which formed a fringe round the front of the ass's body, and would agree well with borror.] mimo with terribilis, 'farcically terrible.' circum stetit, Schenkl aptly compares Aen. ii. 559 At me tum primum saeuus circum stetit borror. horror 'hic active sumitur' Guiet, like our 'fright.' The word rather expresses the grim and forbidding look of the lion's mane on the ass's body, than the bristling and rugged appearance of the hair. 10. praesumptus, the courage with which the ass had armed himself in advance, viz. in assuming the externals of the lion. This seems better than explaining with Barth (Aduers. xxxix. 7 'temere arrogatus'), and Wopkens from the later use of praesumere, 'to presume,'' 'arrogate on false pretences,' as Pacatus uses p. ueniam Paneg. Theodos. 42. This sense is very common in Salvianus, Ennodius and other $5^{\text {th }}$ century writers (see the Excursus), but if I am right in holding that Av. wrote before 400, he would have been using unclassical Latin if he meant this. Or is it a piece of his rudis latinitas? 11. calcans does not mean simply that the ass trod the same pasture-ground with other tame beasts (Wopkens), but that he disdained to share their food, considering himself beyond them. So Cannegieter who compares Capitolin. Vit. Maximi et Balbini xiv Cum Balbinus Maximum quasi ignobilem contemneret, Maximus Balbinum quasi debilem calcaret. Symm. Epist. X. 32 gaudia corporis ut caduca calcauit. Of course in an animal that makes so much use of its heels as the donkey (Phaedr. 1. 23 (21). 9 asinus calcibus frontem extudit) calcans would suggest the quay in which the ass showed his contempt viz. by spurning the ground with bis beels, 'kicking his heels at the pasture.' 12. 'Drove the scared cattle in confusion over their fields.' 13. deprendit, 'caught by grasping (ab) his ear (capistro prebendere of an ass Apul. M.x.2I) and then hurried him off to confinement and drubbing'(correptum u. u. domat). magna aure. So Ovid describing the donkey's ears of Midas Met. xi. 174-7 Nec Delius aures Humanam stolidas patitur retinere figuram, Sed trabit in spatium uillisque albentibus inplet Instabilesque imas facit et dat posse moueri. 14. uinclis all MSS; he was chained, to prevent any such escapades in future. Vinclis uerberibusque occurs in Tib. ii. 3. 80 (Sittl) and is a favorite combination, as Wölflin shows: Prud. Perist. xi. 106 uerbera uincla faces. 15. tergo $=$ tergore, as in Aen. v. 351 tergum Gaetuli inmane leonis (Barth). 16. pecus, 'beast,' of a single animal VIII. 5. So Olenium pecus Heroid. xviii. 188. 17. ignotos, 'strangers,' Ovid A. A. iii. 300 Allicit ignotos ille fugatque uiros. Phaedr. i. II. I Virtutis expers, uerbis iactans gloria Ignotos fallit, notis est derisui, a passage Av. may have been copying. imitato, passive, as in the fragm. of the Timaeus ascribed to Cicero iii initata et efficta simulacra. There was an archaic verb imitare, Non. 473. Dräger ii. 768, 9 gives a long list of past participles of deponents used passively. murmure, 'roar,' here and XXIV. I5 of a lion; XVII. 13 of a tiger. 18. qui quondam, 'as of old.' Verg. Ecl. i. 53 Hic tibi quae semper uicino ab limite saepes.

Babr．civ，Fab．Aesop． 224 Halm，Bodl． 71 Kn ．

It is to be regretted that the last two lines of Babrius＇version of this fable are corrupt in the Athoan MS which alone contains them．It cannot，I think，have curled with the abrupt question $\hat{\omega}$ тú入av，ri $\sigma \epsilon \mu r^{\prime} u \boldsymbol{\eta} \eta$ ；so kutherford），as there is a close agreement in the general sense of these two verses，not only with the words printed them，not indeed believing that they are genuinc in their present form，but as necessary to complete the sense of Babrius，and not perhaps wholly beyond restoration．

The fable of Avianus is itself full of perplexity．In 2 Muncribus scems to mean 'requital' in the bad sense, i.e. punishment. In 8 nǒlam of most MSS is to my ears inconceivable ; yet it seems carly to have become the accepted reading, as it is quoted without variation in the Grammatical treatise printed by Hagen in his Anecdota Heluctica, p. 182, the MS of which was written in the tenth century. In 14 singula, if genuine, is weak, and unexampled in Avianus' other fables; cupis in 16 is harsh, if indeed explicable. It is little to the point to say that these anomalous uses are part of the rudis latinitas which the fabulist avows in his preface; for the style of the rest of the fable is as carefully elaborated as usual, and the words in question stand out in marked relief to the generally correct flow of the language. I accept this fable then as a sufficient proof that Avianus' text underwent considerable depravation before the time when it was redacted in its present form. In any case the Promythion stands on a level with the others and cannot be from Av.

BABR. CIV.

1. est with innatum might seem nearly = innascitur, much as natum esse is used in Cat. X. I5, the neuter participle in each case individualizing more distinctly the quality or thing grown. 'It is a rare quality for a vicious nature to grow.' Yet as facile and difficile have a sympathetic attraction to the perfect, it is perhaps safer, to interpret it so. Veg. is, io diffitile sitis uicit, 'rarely has thirst overcome'; iv. 38 difficile naufragium pertulit qui uentorum rationem diligenter inspexit, 'a careful observer of the winds has rarely been wrecked.' 2. Muneribus (for which neither Withof's conj. Verberibus nor Fröhner's Vulneribus satisfy) I had understood in a general sense: ' vicious natures can rarely be brought to think themselves rewarded as they should be or punished (only) as they deserve.' Then dignas $=$ ' adequate to' the reward or punishment they get, cf. "̈stos in Thuc. But I now accept Sittl's view that Muneribus is simply 'requitals,' 'retaliations' in a bad sense. That Av. would so have written I cannot believe: but in a promythiast all things are possible. 3. nullis latratibus horrens, ' with no gruff bark.' This use of nullus where we should use an adverb 'never' or 'nowhere' is much affected by Av. cf. XXXVI. 7 nullam uerbis conpulsus in iram; $\mathrm{XL}, 3$ nulla graues uariarent terga leones. Sil. ix. 550 diesque Qua nullas umquam transisse optauerit Alpes. Cf. the use of oütıs in Ag. 186 дávtı oüтเขa $\psi \in ́ \gamma \omega \nu$. 4. 'And that gave no first sign of mischief by opening his mouth in wide grins.' So I interpret primum ; generally a snappish dog begins by showing some token of his intended bite, and then bites. This dog gave every sign of good temper and then bit suddenly. Such an animal was called by the Greeks גaitapyos. Possibly primum is corrupt ; simum would be a plausible conj., constructed adverbially with trabens, cf. $\sigma \tau \mu a ̀ \sigma \in \sigma \eta \rho \omega$ s in Meleager. This use of neuter adjectives, singular or plural, is frequent in Ammianus Marcellinus, e. g. insanumb loquentis et ferum xxiii. 6. 80, cf. Mamertin. Grat. Act. Iuliano xiv serenums renidens. Symm. Epist. i. 7 Bauli magnum silentes. Prud. Perist. v. 416 malignum murmurans. trahens, 'i. pandens' Guiet. 5. 'But set his softly-patting tail fearfully beneath him' i. c. under his belly. Mollia uerbera caudae is on the analogy of stuppea uerbera fundae Verg. G. i. 309. pauidae recalls Vergil's Caudamque remulcens Subiecit pauitantens utero Aen. xi. 812 (Cannegieter). 6. 'Would fly into a rage and snap about him recklessly.' Concitus = concitus ira of Ovid Mct. vii. +13 spoken of Cerberus. 7. dominus. It was a law of Solon's that a dog which had bitten anyone should have a three-cubit collar fastened to him and be delivered up to the sufferer (Plut. Solon xxiv, Xen. Hell. ii. 4.41).
nolam, 'bell' of most MSS is suspicious, as (1) the o ought to be long ; (2) Faucibus innexis crepitantia subligat aera immediately following, makes a distressing tautology. Lachmann and Fröhner read notam, perhaps rightly ; uolam which I have found in one of the Peterhouse MSS would more easily explain the corruptions nolam, nollam, and from its rarity might be misunderstood. The St. Gallen Glossary recently edited by Prof. Minton Warren of Baltimore has uola: manus caua in medio unde inuolare dicimus. It was also applied to the sole of the foot. Hence the proverb nee uola nee uestigium, 'neither track nor trace' Non. 416 ; and in this sense it might possibly be used here. By belling his dog, the master made him carry his trail wherever he went. Yet as Prudentius has Nŏlanus short Perist. xi. 208, I have not ventured to alter nollam here: and I see that Bährens retains it also. 9. innexis is part of the same action as subligat, which is here used in its strict sense of tying beneath the dog's throat. crepitantia aera. Verg. G. iv. 15I, tinkling bell of bronze. Barth Aduers. xxxix. I3 quotes a gloss of Albinus: 'Crepitacula dicit: ea uero domini etiam furtiuis appendebant ut quaqua irent a villico audiri possent.' Bells for oxen, sheep, and other animals are mentioned in the vópo $\gamma \in \omega \rho \nless \kappa$ oi based on the code of Justinian. Tit, ii. 2, p. 836 in Heimbach's shaking and ringing spontancously every time the dog moved. signa cauenda, 'signs of alarm;' signa cauendi would be plainer, but Av. transfers the alarm which the bell was to produce towards the dog wearing it to the bell itself : 'signals to be guarded against' for 'signals to be on one's guard.' 11. praemia ferri, 'was brought him as a reward of conduct.' Praemia of a single reward, Ovid Met. viii. 503 cape praemia facti. 12. similem, 'of his peers,' i. e. dog-companions: XL. 2 consimiles feras. ouans. So Merobaudes ii. ro Niebuhr Cuius sacra petit munera mundus ouans. 13. insultantem XV. io. senior XXXVI.7. It is the кv́ఱv ypain of Babrius. de plebe is Avianus' own addition. The contrast of the aristocrat with the plebeian is a point much affected in these fables. See XI. io, XVI. 19, 20 , XXXI. i1, 12, XXXVIII. 11, 12, XL. I-4. superbum, here a substantive, tò $i \pi \epsilon \rho \eta{ }^{\eta} \phi a \nu o \nu, ~ ' t h e ~ s w a g-~-~$ gerer.' 14. Tali, 'what, so loud in shaking your collar?' cingula is my conj. for singula of MSS; Varro R. R. ii. 9. 15 Ne uulnerentur a bestiis, inponuntur bis collaria, quae uocantur melium, id est cingulum circum collum ex corio firmo cumz claunlis capitatis, quae (? quare) intra capita insuitur pellis mollis, ne noceat collo duritia ferri. This proves that cingulum was used (against Serv. on Aen. ix. 357 cingulum bominum generis neutri est. Nam animalium genere feminino dicimus bas cingulas) of a dog's collar. Here it would be the neck-strap to which the bell was attached. Cingula is written singula in Jeep's codex Ambrosianus of Claudian, Deprec. ad Hadrian. 51. 15. Infelix, a word of abuse (Wopkens), like our 'wretch.' The line is slightly altered from Aen. v. ${ }^{4} 65$ Infelix, quae tanta animum dementia cepit? (Cannegieter). sensum, 'understanding.'

2. si cupis. 'If you would have your bell to be a reward of merit' $=$ ' if you would like to make out your bell to be a reward of merit.' This is the obvious meaning, and, though not classical, intelligible. It doubtless belonged to the language of the people. See infra XXIV. 12 Artificis testem si cupis esse manum. Very parallel is the construction of animum inducere in a speech of Scipio Africanus ap. Macrob. S. iii. 14.7 non poteram animum inducere ea liberos suos bomines nobiles docere, 'I could not bring myself to believe.'
3. 'This is no
ornament of merit you flourish in its setting of bronze.' in, in bronze fittings or fixtures. 18. inde, hardly with sonum, 'sound from it,' cf. In Persas tetulere, suo post inde reuentu in the passage of Sueius' Moretum ap. Macrob. S. iii. 18. 12, but more vaguely 'thereby,' by carrying it:' so XXI. ro, XXVII. 4.

1. propriis rebus, 'his own possessions.' Cic. de Leg. Agrar. ii. 2 I. 55 $V$ Venire nostras res proprias et in perpetuum ab nobis abalienari.
2. fabula nostra for nostra fabella of MSS is to some extent supported by $C$, in which the former is written as a correction over the ordinary reading. The Paraphrast too, who quotes vv. $\mathrm{I}_{3}, 1_{4}$ followed by $1-4$, read fabula nostra. Yet this may be a mere correction of a learned scribe posterior to the time when the 4 vv . of the promythion were written. I have in the Introduction stated my belief that none of these promythia are from Av. At any rate it is inconceivable that a poet so familiar not only with Latin poetry as a whole, but with Phaedrus in particular, should give in to the licence of his time in so common a word as fabella. Both words are used for 'fable :' for though Phaedrus once distinguishes fabula from fabella as play from fable (iv. 7. 22 Si nee fabellae te iuuant nee fabulae), his general practice is to treat them indifferently: fabula i. 1. 14, fabellam i. 2. 9, fabella i. 5. 2, fabula i. 10. 3, fabella i. 17. 3, fabella i. 28. 2. 3, 4 seem modelled on Horace C. iii. 10. Io Ne currente retro funis cat rota. 'Lest fortune in anger run quickly back to a stand-still, and the very wheel which at first brought her bounties (dedit), end with humbling its owner.' In this however dedit, whether we supply fortunam or suppose it used absolutely (cf. XXIII. I4) is hardly a well-defined antithesis to minuat. Possibly here, as in some other passages (Val. Fl. ii. 29, 30, Aegrit. Perdicae 97, 98 in Bährens' P. L. M. v. pp. 112-125) a word really belonging to the second of the verses has got into the first, and a word belonging to the first into the second. Hence I would write Indignitn citos ne dit Fortuna recursus Atque eadem minuat, qua (so Paris $A$ ) stetit ante, rota. Cf. Uncle Remus xvi Good-by, Brer Fox, take keer yo' cloze, Fer dis is de avey de avorril goes. Some goes up en some goes down, You'll git ter de bottom all safe en soun'. 5. Corporis inmensi, a somewhat bare genitive of quality, 'huge-bodied,'like Geruicis rigidae equo Trist. i. 4. I4. The remarks which Servius ap. Macrob. S. vi. 8. i-6 addresses to Avienus on the similarly bare Vergilian ablative of quality are very pertinent to this passage. pecus. See on V. i6. isse per auras is the reading of most MISS and might be supported by XIV. I-4 in which all the beasts present themselves before Jupiter, and XXII. 2 in which Jupiter sends Phoebus from heaven ( $a b$ arce poli) to decide between two petitioners, and Phoebus returns to Jupiter with the result; on this view Jupiter might be supposed to have his seat in heayen, and the camel would therefore make his way to him per auras. The grotesqueness of thus representing a camel mounting to the sky was indeed felt by Nevelet, and perhaps may have given rise to the corrected reading of $R$, per aras, which I have found also in a Brit. Mus. codex (b). On this latter view the camel goes from altar to altar in its eagerness to make Jupiter attend, much as Dido in Aen. iv. 56 paces by the altars of the gods to secure, if posdecisive in favour of per auras. 7-10. 'All alike held it an outrageous scandal and a matter for scorn, that while oxen went their way in the pride of double horns, the camel should alone walk entirely undefended, a laughing-stock open to the gibes of the whole beast-world.' 7. irridendum, rare. Ausonius has Deridendasque Camenas Epist. iv. 66. 9. Et solum . . . camelum, sc. ire. Et adversative =et tamen (Dräger ii. 2022). nulla munitum parte, language of siege operations, but also of bodies Veg. i. 20 Dimicandi acriorems sumat audaciam qui munito capite uel pectore non timet uulinus. 10. Obiectum and expositum are combined as in Aen. x. 694 obuius and expostus. Nerobaudes Carm. iv. 43 Niebuhr Obiectus Geticis puer cateruis. 11. arridens. Macrob. S. iii. 17. 17 of Cleopatra dissolving the pearl Tunc regina adridens fialam poposcit, cui aceti nonnibil acris infudit atque illuc unionem demptum ex aure altera festinabunda demisit. sperata, 'his petition.' 12. magnae auris. The shortness of the camel's ears is noticed by Buffon Hist. Naturclle xi. p. 244. It is probably the want of proportion between these and the long neck of the animal that suggested the idea of their having lost part of their natural size in that pre-historic period when beasts and birds 'conversed as well as sung.' 13. minor merito, 'beneath your merit' i.e. on humbler conditions than you might naturally claim. Ovid Pont. ii. 6. 6 Et mala me meritis ferre minora doces. Wopkens however explains 'mutilated as you deserve to be,' 'with the loss of a limb as you deserve.' Cf. Juv. viii. 4 zumer oque minorem Coruinum. cui non sufficit, 'since you are discontented.' XXXIII. 8, XXXVI. It, Dräger ii. 507. 14. geme, 'deplore.' My Brit. Mus. codex $B$ gives tene which avoids the short concluding syllable, a rare occurrence in these fables.

Phaedrus r .2 has a parallel fable, in which two travellers meeting a robber, one shows fight, the other runs away. The robber is killed, and the coward immediately runs up to his friend, draws his sword and promises to assist him to the death. The other replies in words partly resembling Avianus Ego qui sum expertus quantis fugias uiribus, Scio quam uirtuti non sit credendum tuae.

1. The road led them sometimes over high mountain-ground, sometimes through winding valleys. The expression is a little like Vegetius iii, 22 Oportunis uallibus uel siluosis montibus. artum with iter as Tacitus Ann. xv. 38 Artis itineribus bucque et illuc flexis, but in a different sense, not of narrow roads, but a journey through close ground.
2. Cum socio quidam, 'two comrades.' 3. Securus, quodcumque malum fortuna dedisset... posset uterque pati. This construction is like II. 3. If any change is to be introduced, perhaps quoicumque, suggested by quocumque of $B$, may seem to anticipate uterque somewhat more effectively and clearly than quodcumque of most MSS. It will mean 'to whichever of the trwo,' as Quis is used for uter in IV.3. 4. posset, a lively change from the oratio obliqua in which the protasis is couched to an apodosis stated directly. From securus to tulisset the sentence begins as if posse utrumque pati were to complete it; but with the new line, the form of the apodosis is suddenly altered ' Feeling safe, whatever misfortune chance should bring,-why, each would be able to combine their strength and endure it.' Wopkens quotes Hyg. Fab. cxxxix Quod sciret, si quis ex eo natus esset, se regno priuaret. Guiet explained securus (ut) posset $=$ certus posse utrumque pati quodcumque robore collato: but this can hardly be right. 5. per inseptum, 'through a piece of unenclosed ground,' where they could converse with more freedom, and where the bear's attack would be lcss apprehended and from the want of means of escape more dangerous. MSS have inceptum, which Guiet retains, explaining iter inceptum. uario sermone, a Vergilian phrase, Aen. i. 748, vi. 160, viii. 309. 6. praeceps conuenit, 'rushes to meet them.' Liberior' iusto, 'over gay, or jocose,' after he had shown his cowardice by leaving his friend in the lurch. The joke is contained in 20. For the adj. used adverbially see Dräger ${ }^{\circ}$. 325. fugax may have been suggested by the last line in Phaedrus' parallel fable v. 2. 15 Qui re secunda fortis est, dubia fugax. 19. Dic, sodes, ' pray, tell me.' Fronto Epist. i. I Dic sodes boc mibi. rettulit, 'told, related.' Ovid Her. i. 39 Rettulit et ferro Rbesumque Dolonaque caesos. 20. 'For she spoke much with you in private and long.' diu with multa following is slightly tautologous, but the language of fables is supposed to be natural, and tautology is the commonest vice of natural talk. Uncle Remus is an exaggerated example.

21, 22 are rightly suspected by Lachmann: quoque in 21 is weak, and dixit in 23, which where it stands is effective if 21,22 are omitted, becomes tautologous after iussit in 21. 21. quoque of MSS would mean that grave as were the warnings of the bear, they included one more serious than all the rest, viz. to be chary of making friends. The old English Translation may be quoted here. 'He taught me many faire secrets, but among all other things he said to me, that I should never trust him which hath once decived mee.' 22. sunt of MSS is perhaps meant to break off the connexion of the clause with haec maxima iussit. 'And I, poor wretch, must needs carry out her warning uniformly.' This seems to be supported by the repetition of dixit in 23, as if after an interruption. But it would be wrong to argue this from Av. writing sunt, not sint: for in writers of this age the fact of the clause Quae misero ... mihi belonging to the reported speech of the bear would not determine the choice of sint rather than sunt. So in Veg. iv. 35 Obseruandum praccipue, ut a quintadecima luna usque ad uicesimam secundam arbores praecidantur, ex quibus liburnae contexendae sunt, none of Lang's MSS give sint, yet the sense is obviously that during the days from the $15^{\text {th }}$ to the 22nd the wood is to be felled for making Liburnian galleys. This lax use of the indic. where correct Latin requires the subj. is common in law Latin, Roby Introduct. to Digest p.ccxvi. 23. facile, 'lightly,' 'without consideration,' Veg. ii. 17 Legionis ius est facile nee fugere nec sequi. repetas repeats alterius, 'return again to partnership with a new friend,' now you have had experience of the first. 24. insana, 'rabid,' here of a voracious animal: in XXVIII. 4 of a restive bullock.

Fab. Acs. 410 Halm , Bodl. I4I Kn.
The Bodleian Paraphrast seems here to come nearer to what must have been a Babrian original than the version printed by Halm. I give it accordingly, omitting the promythion.

Haupt reduced this to an original by no means worthy of Babrius. The latest scazontic attempt is Gitlbauer's (179).

Avianus has nowhere repeated himself so often as in this short twelve-line fable. Capillos, comas of $\mathrm{I}, 2=$ capillos, comae of $1 \mathrm{I}, 12$; capiti of $\mathrm{I}=$ caput of 6 ; nudo of $2=$ nudo of 7 ; nitidis conspectus of $4=$ nituit of 7 , conspiciente of 6; Ridiculum $6=$ risus 9 ; adposita $8=$ positos 11 .

1. capiti, probably dative, and so I think Ovid M. xiv. 735 Cum foribus laquei religaret uincula summis.
2. A mere expansion of r. alias, 'strange,' $\xi \in \in \operatorname{cas}$ of the prose versions. In ordinary Latin it would be alienas. Ovid A. A. iii. 165, 6 may have suggested the expression Femina procedit densissima crinibus emptis, Proque suis alios efficit aere suos. uertice, 'crown.' Apuleius M. xi. ro bi capillum derasi funditus uertice pracnitente, of priests of Isis. 3. Cannegieter wrote Ad Ciant um, supposing the eques to be displaying his horsemanship in the favorite exercising-ground of the Roman youth. But Av. throughout avoids localizing his fables; and as an open piece of ground is at once necessary for cavalry evolutions and particularly exposed to wind, it seems unnecessary to understand anything more special. Paneg. ii. 6 A tribunali temet in campum, a curuli in equum transtulisti. conspectus, 'conspicuous,' a common use from Vergil onwards. See Servius on Aen, viii. 588. Apul. x. I7 Conspectum atque famigerabilem meis miris artibus effeceram dominum. So acceptus. 4. Observe the alliteration facilem frenis flectere. facilem. Nemesian. Cyn. 266 Nam flecti facilis lasciuaque colla secutus, of a Moorish horse. flectere, as in Hor, C. iii. 7. 25 Qzamuis non alius fectere equum sciens Aeque conspicitur gramine Martio, a passage which might seem to favour the view that campum in 3 is the Campus Martius.
3. Huius might possibly be constructed with $a b$ aduerso, as Wopkens suggested; for a genitive is found not only after ex aduerso (Plin. iv. ir) but ex contrario (Ampel. Memor. vi Ex contrario barum). This however is unnecessary here, as caput follows in 6 . spiramina. Amm. Marc. xvii. 7. If Ventorum apud nos spiramina nulla sentiri. Veg. iv. 38 Secundo spiramine optatos classis inuenit portus. praeflant seems at least a possible correction of the MSS praestant, as the wind blew in the man's face. praestant of MSS must = faciunt, a sense very frequent in the Decadence: and found as early as Serenus Sammonicus (second century) e.g. 49 Iuuenem praestant rediuiuo flore capillum. Veg. iii. 8 Tutum iter commeantibus proestant. Auson. Grat. Act. 3 Non palatium, quod tu, cum terribile acceperis, amabile praestitisti. Epist. i. it Ita me dis probabilem praestem ut ego boc tuum carmen (Ausonius' Mosella) libris Maronis adiungo. Prud. Perist. x. 779 Me partus unus ut feracem gloriae, Mea uita, praestet, in tua situm est manu. 6. Ridiculum if praeflant (or, as most edd. give, perflant) is read, must be used predicatively, the wind blew upon the front of the knight's head, making it look laughable in the eyes of the bystanders. With this cf. Symm. Epp. i. 50 Quaeso ut nos plenos gaudii quam primum reuisas, 'revisit and make us full of joy.'

Manilius similarly v. 146 Illis cura sui cultus, frontisque decorae Semper erit: totos in fluctum ponere crines, Aut uinclis rewocare comas, et uertice denso Fingere et adpositis caput emutare capillis. Cannegieter (who cites this passage) thought Avianus' knight wore what remained of his natural hair surmounted by a wig on the crown; then discolor would express the distinct colours of the natural hair and the wig. There is nothing to support this view : the knight's head becomes a ridiculous sight simply because the wig gets loose and exposes the forehead in its bald nudity.

Fab. Aesop. $422 \mathrm{Halm}=$ Bodl. $147_{-}^{\circ} \mathrm{Kn}$.

This fable is alluded to in the Son of Sirach xiii. 2, as Mr. Margoliouth has pointed out to me.

1. Eripiens, snatching away from their position. on the bank by the sudden falling in of the earth at the edge. cedentibus virtually = sidentibus. 2. Insanis, 'violent,' XXVIII. 4. pariter, 'side by side.' 3. ars et natura. Not only were the materials different to start with (natura), but the way in which they were worked up (ars); one was of earth fashioned by the potter, the other of bronze, fused by the smith. 5. Dispar concordia motus, 'an uneven (discordant) uniformity of motion.' Oxymoron. Dispăr like impăr XVIII. Io, a licence which may readily be condoned from the $a$ of the other cases. fragili, 'the brittle,' solidae, 'the solid,' are opposed here as in Hor. S. ii. r. 77 Fragili quaerens illidere dentem Offendet solido. Most MSS give fragili et solidae, a very rare deviation from the strict rules of clision generally followed by Av. There is no other instance in the fables of the last syllable of the second foot being elided. It is therefore possible that et should be omitted as it is in my Bodleian MS $X$. Some of the earliest MSS too give solido. Possibly Av. wrote Dispar erat fragili solido concordia motu, solido motu depending on concordia and representing a poetical variation on solidae motu. 'The brittle pot kept even but irregular pace with the movement of the solid.' The two pots move on together (concordia) but not evenly (dispar): each is borne on by the stream, but with an irregular motion, sometimes approaching, sometimes drifting away from each other. 6. I follow here without hesitation my Brit. Museum MS $B$ which has uagans, against uagus of most MSS. The steps of error probably were uagàs uagas uagus. The river had flooded its banks and was running irregularly (incertum iter), its currents drifting unsteadily. 7. elisam confringeret=elideret et confringeret, 'should smash and shatter.' The two words are not synonymous; elisam expresses the previous bruising, confringeret the final breaking up. Schenkl's illisam is tempting, aerea testa, which I venture to write on the authority of $P$, may be supported by Pliny's aereo testo H. N. xxxii. 8 r . 8. solitam of MSS can hardly be right, as the pots were on a quite exceptional journey. solidam seems an easy conjecture, and would aptly express the course taken by the more solid of the companion travellers, at the same time that it suggests the brittleness of the other (fragili et solidae 5). [Sittl writes the two vv. thus, Ne tamen elisam confringeret, aerea testa Iurabat solitam longius ire uiam, and explains 'Aerea testa fictili, quae longius ire uiam solebat, iurabat se non elisam confringere eam.' On this view iurabat ne confringeret = 'swore not to break,' with which Sittl compares I. 2.] ire = se ituram esse, sce on I. I. 'Swore to pursue its metallic course at a distance' from its frailer brother. Prop. iii. 6. 40 Iurabo et bis sex integer esse dies, 'will swear to remain chaste.' 9. 'Fearing it might prove a case of light damaged by heavy.' Such, I think, is the force of the neuters. A good instance of Av.'s occasional felicitousness.
2. 'And because confidence cannot exist between the humble and the exalted.' Phaedr. i. 5

Numquam est fidelis cum potente societas. Varro ap. Miacrob, S. ii, 8. 3 dulcibus cum $\pi \epsilon \in \notin \in \iota$ societas infida. breui, $\tau \bar{\varphi} \beta p a x \in \hat{i}$, 'the small and insignificant.' 'Robustiore, ualentiore,' Guiet. 11. uerbis, in implied opposition to fucts, 'so far as words go.' 12. decutiendus, $A C$ and virtually both the Vossian MSS, discutiendus $B O$ and the second Peterhouse MS, which would be Lucretian vi. $38-40$. The participle in -dus from the third century onwards was increasingly used as a future passive participle. In Ammianus Marcellinus it is very frequent, see Dräger ii. p. 791. 'I shall not be able to shake my soul rid of its fear :' the pot has a soul, as the fish has tears in XX. 5. 13. conferat, 'bring into collision,' lit. 'bring close.' 14. 'I alone shall always be the victim of either misfortune.' ambobus seems here to mean each disaster in succession or indifferently, i. e. of myself knocking against you, or your knocking against me. Whereas the bronze olla would be uninjured in cither case.

Suarez (Praeneste Antiqua c. xiv. 1655) speaking of the famous Inscription to Fortune at Praeneste (Anth. Lat. i. 622 Meyer) thought it belonged to the age of Valentinian and Gratian, and asserts that Fortuna was still worshipped at that time, as the letters of Symmachus show. The inscription must certainly be late, as Rome is called in it urbs sacra.

1. molitus, 'after breaking up.' Colum. vi. 2. Io Aratro iniuncto terrann moliri cogitur (ituencus).
2. Thensaurum. It was a common thing to find treasure in digging or ploughing. Hor. S. ii. 6. so $O$ si urnam argenti fors quae mibi monstret! See Wernsdorf Poet. Minor. ii. p. 338. Petron. S. 38 quom Incuboni pillcum rapnisset, thesaurum inucnit. In the Digest xli. I. $6_{3}$ various questions are raised as to the different claims which the discoverer of such treasure (presumably a slave), the owner of the land where it was, found, etc., might make to take part or all. 3. indigna, ' disesteemed,' 'despised.' Phaedr. iii. 12.3 Iaces indigno quanta res, inquit, loco, not 'innocent,' as if the plough deserved better treatment.
aratra, of a single plough, as in Ovid Her. ix. 29 Quam male inaequales ueniunt ad aratra iunenci. 4. 'Driving his oxen to a better feed,' as a kind of recognition of the good service they had done him in turning up the treasure, Semina seems here to be used in one of its Vergilian senses for 'plants,' G. ii. 268, 301 : or possibly for herbs like cytisus which spring from seed sown. Plin. H. N. xiii. 132, Colum. v. 12. 3, viii. 4.2. Avienus, the translator of Aratus, 398, 9 has a similarly vague use of the word, Tunc succisa Ceres statim cum mergite culmi Construitur, flouos tondentur semina crines Omnia et aduectas late coquit area messes, where it nearly $=$ 'crops.' meliora, than barley, for instance (Plin. xiii. 130). conpellens. Verg. Ecl. ii. 30 Haedorumque gregem uiridi conpellere bibisco. In Av. the preposition has lost much of its force, as a poor countryman would only have enough oxen for the purpose of his plough, not a drove. 5 . supplex, not in its ordinary sense of imploring favours, but as Apuleius uses supplicue gratiis persolutis M. xi. 24 fin. Macrobius tells us that vows were made to Earth in a sitting posture, and her worshippers carefully touched the ground (S. i. 10. 2 I). telluri. Varro R. R. I. I. 4 Et quoniam dei facientes adiuuant, prius inuocabo cos . . primum, qui omnes fructus agriculturae caelo et terra continent, Iouem et Tellurem. Macrobius S. i. 10. 20, 21 says Tellus was by some identified with Ops, cuius ope bumanae uitae alimenta quaeruntur, uel ab opere per quod fructus frugesque nascuntur. Av. probably alludes to this identification in 6 depositas opes. aras, plur. to show his gratitude. They would doubtless be made of grass. Hor. C. i. 19. 13 Hic uiuum mibi caespitem, bic Verbenas, pueri, ponite turaque. Prud. Perist. v. 50 Aut ara ture et caespite Precanda iam nunc est tibi. 6. sibi, to the rustic. depositas, ' committed to her charge.' Depositum, depositor are frequent in the Digest. 7. fortuna. Treasure found accidentally, as by digging or strolling near the spot (Dig. xli. i. 63 Finge terram fodientem inuenisse-quod uero subito in abdito loco positum nibil agens, sed aliter ambulans inuenit) was looked upon as a gift of fortune. Dig. l. c. Thensaurus donum fortunae creditur. prouida, 'with an eye to the future,' when the treasure would be exhausted, and its owner reduced to poverty. So XXXIV. 2 Nec timuit uitae prouidus ante mala. According to Macrobius S. v. 16. 8 Pbilosopbi qui eam (Fortunam) nominant, nibil sua ui מosse sed decreti siue prouidentiae ministram esse uoluerunt. 8. indignam ... dolens, 'complaining that she in her turn was not thougbt worthy of incense.' But the form of the sentence is unusual as (1) indignam $=$ indignam baberi ; (2) quoque would more naturally follow a non-negative word. Hence there is plausibility in my conj. indiguam se quoque ture docens (docens Lachm.). Indiguus was used by Paulinus of Nola twice in his poems on S. Felix (xx. 4, xvi. 195 Migne) but with a genitive: Hildebrand has restored it from some MSS in Apul. M. iv. iz Refectione uirium uebementer indiguus, where other MSS give indignus, and again in Apul. de Deo Socrat. § in (see Lütjohann's Greifswald Progr. for 1878) alienae lucis indigua (MSS indicia). The abl. would be justified by Lucretius' indigus omni Vitali auxilio v. 225. 9. Nune, 'at present' as opposed to the coming future Sed cum subrepto fueris tristissimus auro. inuenta, Calp. iv. IIT quoted above. non prodis munera MSS, except that $P$ has prodi, and the oldest Vossianus as quoted by Bährens, pro. The verb prodere in the sense of handing on, transmitting is not uncommon, especially with memoriae or litteris, each of which is found in Vegetius (iii. r, iii. 26), more rarely of passing on a personal or concrete object, as in Macrob. S. iii. 9. 8 the gods who leave a captured city are implored proditi Romam ad me meosque ueniatis. Here, then, Fortune would complain that the countryman kept his treasure to himself, instead of making it over to some one of her temples. In being so committed to Fortune's charge, it would not of course pass out of its owner's hands; but be stored up in reserve to be removed as occasion required. The other sense of 'announcing,' 'making public statement of 'anything, which is more common in the Latin of this period (Mamert. Paneg. xv proditio futuri, xviii nondum cuncta prodidimus. Symm. i. 3 I libelli tui arguis proditorem, in each of which last two passages it is opposed to secretum) seems to me not to suit the passage. templis, a vague plural, not implying more than ' to temple of mine.' facere, the more classical use of the verb in Plautus and other early writers, and common in Symmachus and other writers of the Decadence, as Pareus' ind. to Symm, and Schenkl's to Ausonius show. Symm. v. 9I Me sernonis tui bonore participas. Auson. Epist. xxi Vt me participes. 12. inops, the rare adjective ending of the pentameter is here very effective. Compare Propertius' Ante fores dominae condur oportet iners, the last line of the Elegy on Paetus (iii. 7. 72 ).

The long-haired goats bred in the Mauritanian territory washed by the Cinyps from the time of Vergil (G. iii. 312), became typical of the whole race, and the adj. Cinypbizus almost connoted goats. See the passages collected in my edition of Ovid's Ibis p. xxvi. solet, historic present for solitus est. 5. Post, rather more significant than Ast. The bull only gradually discovered that the cavern was already occupied. A slight pause is supposed to intervene-then after some time he retires. [Sitt] reading Hunc post explains post as =postquam, on the analogy of mox = mox ut, which Hartel and Petschenig prove for late Latin poets (Wiener Studien i. 210,247 , iii. 306). But though a parallel might perhaps be thought to exist in XXV. 1 I, this barbarism is not proved for Av.] summissa $C$ and the earliest MSS, not submissa, as irrumpere not inrumprec. ## BABR, Livt.

The ape in Greek was nicknamed Ka入入ias, and the nickname may have suggested this fable. Pindar, in a well-known passage, Pyth. ii. 73 Kadós $\pi i \theta \omega \nu$, 'a young ape,' and Babrius seems to have remembered both the passage and the word. Gildersleeve Comm. on Pindar, p. 264, quotes from Galen: 'The ape was a favorite in the nursery then as he is now. Galen de Usu Part. i. 22 Kadós тol $\pi i \theta \eta$ коs $\pi a \rho a ̀ ~ \pi a \iota \sigma i \nu ~ a i \epsilon i, ~ ф \eta \sigma i ~ \tau ı s ~ \tau \omega ̂ \nu ~ \pi a \lambda a t \omega ̂ \nu ~$

This fable does not seem to exist in the prose versions. But in one of the fables published by Halm (200, $200^{\text {h }}$ ) Jupiter assembles the birds with the view of electing the handsomest of them to be king : the jackdaw decks himself in borrowed plumes and is on the point of being chosen king, when the other birds strip him of his finery. To this extent the two fables agree.

1. in toto orbe $=\pi \hat{a} \sigma \iota$ тoîs $\zeta$ ¢́o七s. $\quad$ 2. 'Which gave the finest child as an offering.' natorum is an epexegetic or appositional genitive, like praemia pecuniae Caes. B. C. iii. 83, Gell. x. 18.5 ; praemium missionis Caes, B. C. i. 85 (Dräger i. pp. 429,430 ). meliora, 'better than the rest,' an inaccuracy natural and not necessarily belonging to debased Latin, as Unrein would make out, p. 53. 3. Certatim, 'eagerly'' Glossar. Sangallense ed. Minton Warren p. I4 8 Certatim: stutiosim (studiosim). genus omne ferarum. Calp. Ecl. ii. ro, it Affuit omme genus pecudum, genus omne ferarum Et quodcumque uagis altum ferit aetbera pennis, where H. Schenkl shows the original is Verg. G. iii. 480, iv. 223. 4. The first suggestion of this $v$. is that cattle and men were forced to appear together, as well as wild beasts (permixtos rusticis seruos baurire Macrob. S. vii. 7. I 4), before the tribunal of Jupiter. (So Schenkl.) This is not impossible, as there would be a reason for the civilized animals appearing together; man and the beasts tamed by man. But it seems unlikely, if this is the meaning, that the Babrian original should make no allusion to man, or that one of the principal actors in the piece should be introduced casually by Av. In the similar bird-story too (Halm 200, $200^{\text {b }}$ ) man is wholly omitted. I prefer then to explain Permixtum homini pecus as tame animals living promiscuously with mankind, as contradistinguished from wild creatures (ferarum). So Pliny speaks of two races intermarrying as Aethiopia Trogodytis conubio permixta xii.86. (Bährens conj. Permistumque cicur.) cogitur ire, 'needs must go:' the words mean no more than that all were to present themselves without exception. Somewhat similarly Uncle Remus xx Brer ruolf be up'n say be bleedzd fer b'leeve Brer Rabbit got dem fisbes. 5. Sed nee, like Sed et, belongs to the Latin of the Silver and subsequent periods. Dräger ii. p. Io6 quotes instances from Justin Lactantius and the Historia Augusta. Add Macrob. S. vi. 7. 6. ad iurgia, 'to contest their claim.' Varro de L. L. vii. 93 (Spengel 1885) Quod ait (Plautus) iurgio id est litibus; itaque quibus res erat in controuersia, ea uocabatur lis; ideo in actionibus uidemus dici: Quam rem siue me litem dicere oportet. Ex quo licet uidere, iurgare esse ab iure dictum, cum quis iure litigaret. (Cannegieter.) 6. purior, 'clearer' than the watery medium in which fishes live. Ovid M. xv. $2+3$ Aer atque aere purior ignis. Lucret. v. 448, 9 Et seorsum mare uti secreto umore puteret, Seorsus item puri secretique aetberis ignes. Macrob. 2. Bährens' conj. In tergo is too grotesque to be admitted against all MSS. And at any rate the ape did not so introduce her child (traheret 9). Inter quos seems to mean that in the general assembly of congregated animals the mother representative of each species led up her offspring to be inspected by Jupiter. Somewhat more precisely Wopkens 'Nihil uetat intelligi affuisse etiam matribus suos coniuges.' trepidae, 'in fluttering haste,' each hoping to be the lucky competitor. pignera, 'children,' a sense found as early as Ovid MI. xi. 542, 3 Subeunt illi fraterque parensque, Huic cum pigneribus domus et quodcumque relictum est, and increasingly frequent in the second and following centuries. 8. discutienda, 'to be examined, scrutinized:' properly sifted. Ennod. Vit. Epiphanii p. 374 Hartel animae meae et regni utilitate discussa. It is commoner in the substantives discussor discussio used of revising accounts. Symmachus v. 76 uses the words of examining the costs of a public building and forming estimates thereon.
3. breuis, 'dwarfish.' Ovid F.ii. 574 Qua breuis occultum mus sibi fecit iter. Macrob. S. v. 19. 19 Lacus breues sed in immensum profundi. Breuis =paruus, breuitas = paruitas are tolerably common in the writers of this period. See Iahn on Macrob. S. v. 19. 19, Hildebrand on Apul. > Babr. lxv.

Suidas s.v. yépavos quotes two verses which seem to belong to a fable on the same subject:

Corrupt as these are, they show that the extant version of Babrius, given above, is a poor and weak curtailment of the original (Rutherford). This is proved also by the longer of Halm's prose versions ( $397^{\text {b }}$ ), from which it appears that the complete Babrian fable made the peacock contrast his own gold and purple with the crane's dull and colourless plumage, as Avianus has also done. It seems probable then that the Latin poet's version is here not so much an expansion as a paraphrase, from which we may try to reconstruct the complete Babrian original.

1. Threiciam uolucrem, 'the crane.' Ovid A. A. iii. 182 Threiciamue gruem. Verg. Aen. x. 265 Strymoniae grues. Stat. S. iv. 6. 9 biberna Rbodopes grue. Iunonius ales, 'the peacock,' a bird sacred to Juno.

Ovid A. A. i. 627 Laudatas ostentat auis Iunonia pennas. Juno, when Argus was slain, placed his hundred eyes in the peacock's tail. Ovid M. i. 722 Excipit bos (oculos) uolucrisque suae Saturnia pennis Collocat et gemmis caudam stellantibus inplet. Hence there is a motif for the bird being here called Iunonius. 2. Communi sociam ...cibo. This agrees with the two lines, probably of the original Babrian fable, cited above from Suidas. The two birds shared the same pasture-ground (V. Ir, XXXVII. 6), and the peacock took offence at the implied equality. detinuisse is my conj. for continuisse or continuasse of MSS. Hor. Ep. i.3.27 Nisi cena prior potiorque puella Sabinum Detinet, 'engages' Wilkins there. I cannot believe with Barth Aduers. xxxix. is that continuasse could mean as explained in a glossographer cited by him 'perpetuo colere atque amare: ' and if it could, this meaning would not suit the passage, any more than the otherand indubitable sense of 'following closely,' "attending' which Scioppius Suspect. Lect. iv. 16 established for both continuari and continuare from Apuleius and Symmachus. The only Glossarial evidence I have found for a meaning that would apply to our fable is from Auct. T.ii. 22 Continuatus congressus contestatus, i. e. joining issuc or impleading: this would be the participle of continuari, and it is just possible that continuare might have been used in a similar sense. Among the various other emendations proposed, conteruisse, 'disparaged' (Ellis), or conripuisse, 'reproved' (Fröhner), are as plausible as any.

Hand Tursellin. iii. p. 395. 5. multimodo, 'manifold,' a word used by Apuleius, from whom Koziol Stil des Apuleius p. 275, quotes also omnimodus unimodus. In MSS it is often confused with multinōdis. decore. Cannegieter aptly quotes Columella viii. II Harum autem decor auium etiam exteros, nedum dominos oblectat. Rose's Physiognomist Anecd. The popularity of this fable is proved by the numerous prose versions. Shakespere probably alludes to it in his Dirge (Cymbeline iv. 2) To thee the reed is as the oak. Wordsworth, in his poem The Oak and the Broom, has drawn out the rival pleadings at much length and with great felicity of expression. Macrobius S. vii. 8, 6 has a passage which in its wording looks as if Avianus' fable might have been known to him. Habes et boc exemplum non dissonum, quod potentior mola ampliora grana confringit, integra illa quae sunt minutiora transmittit: uento nimio abies aut quercus auellitur, cannams nulla facile frangit procella. Claudian Deprecatio ad Hadrianum 37 Incubuit numquam caelestis flamma salictis, Nec parui frutices iram meruere Tonantis. Ingentes quercus, annosas fulminat ornos.

1. radicitus eruta. Vergilian, Aen. v. 449, where Ribbeck gives radicibus with the Medicean : the Roman ( $R$ ) has radicitus. quercus, the oak swept along by the swoln river is as old as Homer. Il. xi. $492^{\prime} \Omega s \delta^{\prime}$ subter, 'below the tree.' decurrens, 'flowing down,' and therefore carrying with it in its current anything that falls in. alueus is somewhat harsh with et fluuio following. Vergil's familiar Atque illum in praeceps prono rapit alueus amni seems to be the suggesting outline. 4. Suscipit $=\vec{\epsilon} \dot{\delta} \omega \kappa \epsilon$ пот« $\mu \hat{\varphi}$, as rapit $=\ddot{\epsilon} \sigma v \rho \epsilon . \quad$ praecipitante, intransitive as in Cic. de Orat. iii. 48. 186 in amni praecipitante. 5. 'But when its tall length was pushed by either bank from side to side.' diuersis. The oak struck against one bank and was then repelled by it to the other, its height causing it to strike each with either end alternately, until it ended with stranding on a bed of reeds. 6. residit, 'rests after drifting.' residit $P$ with one of Voss's MSS and my Brit. Mus. B. These I have followed against resedit of $C$ and most other MSS, as throughout this fable there is a noticeable recurrence of the present, a marked avoidance of past, tenses. [It is however to be noted that Seeck's MSS of Symmachus' Epistles i. 19 give residi for resedi.] grande onus oak marvelled that a reed fastening as it does its stalks together with only a slender tuft of roots stands firm in the flowing water.' So Cannegieter, referring conectens to harundo, though the first impression of the passage is that conectens is said of the oak interlacing its boughs with the slender tufts of the reeds, and so feeling their weakness and expressing surprise at their power of resistance. exiguo caespite seems to mean the slender bunch of roots from which the reed with its branching stalks rises: and so Philargyrius, whom Conington follows, interprets in G. iv. 273 uno ingentem tollit de caespite siluam. Canneg. quotes besides Claud. de R. Pros. iii. 371 , Prud. Cath. x. 123 , but both passages are doubtful. See below on XXI. 2. ramos, properly the thin rods which surmount and sprout from the knotted or geniculated stem of the reed, Plin. xvi. 163. Av. perhaps docs not speak with such particularity. 8.

 II. I. 9. I believe I have restored intelligibility to this line by reading rectam non sistere for necdum (rectum $C$ ) consistere of MSS. The objection is not to necdum being used for nondum, which Iahn (Introd. to Macrobius p. xli) shows to have been common in that writer (see Sat. vii. 4. 7, vii. 7. 17 Mustum cum necdum suaue est, sed tantummodo dulce, and cf. Symm. Laud. in Gratianum Qui necdum nouerant felicius iudicarent. Epist. i. I Sed te Baulorum necdum lenta otia quaerunt. Claud. Laud. Stilic. i. 3 Conubii necdum festiuos regia cantus Sopierat), but to its being the exact reverse of what we should expect, non iam: for all attempts to force the meaning of ' not yet ' into the passage are futile. rectam non sistere $=$ Babrius' $\dot{\epsilon} \xi \in \rho t-$

Babr. has oúk $\epsilon \pi \epsilon \pi-$ тढ́кєє. 11. blando, 'submissive,' 'deferential,' as became its character of safe weakness (tutam debilitate). 12. docens Lachmann for docet of MSS. This cannot be considered certain, as Av, has some undoubted deviations fiom the normal use of que, atque. XVII. I3 Illa gemens fractoque loqui uix murmure coepit, Lachm. coeptans. XXV. 5 Ille sibi abrupti fingens discrimina funis Atque auri queritur desiluisse cadunn (where $C$ alone has $A C$, whence Fröhner Hac). It seems possible that the peculiar combination of participle in the first clause followed by Atque (que) and a final verb in the second which marks both XVI. 12 and XXV. 5 is a designed affectation

Є̇ $\gamma \in ́ v \in \tau 0$. In Lucan Phars. vi. 400, 1 Prima fretum scindens Pagasaeo litore pinus Terrenumque nouas bominem proiecit in undas is a well-supported reading. 14. totis uiribus. Claud. Rapt. Pros. iii. 378 Alternasque ferit totisque obnixa trementes Viribus inpellit. acta. Ovid M. ii, 184 Vt acta Praecipiti pinus Borea. 15. Verg. Aen. iii. 481 Fando surgentes demoror ('keep dallying') austros, a line which Av. has applied very felicitously in a quite different way, to the wind playing gently in the reed-tops before it becomes boisterous. surgentes paulatim, 'gradually rising,' when they begin to make themselves heard, but only faintly. 16. quamuis leuibus, 'however lightly-blowing,' the lightest breath of the south winds.  uida, as in XII. 7. 17. ' Against your sturdy stem the rain-cloud bursts in fury.' The reading is very doubtful, but praeruptus not proruptus is tolerably certain. se fundit for offendit of MSS might express the same ideaas Lachmann's se effiundit without the improbable elision. Ovid M. i. 269 has Densi funduntur ab aethere nimbi. praeruptus, 'furious,' 'violent.' Amm. Marc. xxii. 8. 40 praeruptis undarum uerticibus. Lachm.'s proruptus is however very tempting: cf. eruptus in Amm. Marc. xxx. 4. 20 Erupta maledicendi ferocia multos offendunt. 18. Motibus, a word very much affected by the Panegyrici, vii. 5 Vt oceanus ille tanto uectore stupefactus caruisse suis motibus uideretur. vi. 7 Vt enim ille qui omnes aquas caelo et terris praebet oceanus semper tamen in motibus suis totus est. ludificata, 'mocked' or 'baffled,' a Plautine and Terentian word, almost invariably used of persons. Gloss. Sangall. ludificat inludit. Babrius has $\pi p o ̀ s ~ \mu \epsilon i \zeta o v a s ~ \phi i \lambda o \nu \epsilon \iota к o v ́ v \tau \omega \nu$. 'These words warn us that it is in vain we resist the great, and that it is by slow degrees that we surmount their fierce threats.' But one of my best MSS ( $B$ ) has a remarkable variant lustra which seems to point to a different reading, possibly fluxa $=$ inbecilla (Plin. Paneg. 33 non enerue nec fuxum). With this subsistere of the Bodleian MS $O$ would well agree, whereas it could not have been admitted as a variant if frustra had stood in the text originally. I would suggest, then, to write the vv .-

Haec nos dicta monent magnis subsistere fluxa, Paulatimque truces exsuperare minas.
'This fable teaches us that weak thins hold out against strong, and by slow degrees surmount their menace and fury.?

 $\pi \lambda \dot{\eta} \rho \eta$ s. per sua lustra feras. Vergil has lustra ferarum G. ii. 47 I , Aen. iii. 647, and so Nemesianus Cyneg. 98. Cf. Macrob. vii. 2. 13 Qui uenatibus. gaudet, interrogetur de siluae ambitu, de ambage lustrorum. 3. pauidis audax, an effective juxtaposition of antitheta. 4. Verbere commoto, 'lashing about with his tail,' partly to show his anger, partly to call the huntsman's attention. See my note on Cat. 1xiii. 8 r . adesse, 'to present himself,' 'come up and fight.' A free matically constructed with lacerto, really refers to the action expressed in contorquens, 'brandishing a dart as usual with his shoulder.' So Val. Fl. iii. 45 Hostis babet portus, soliti rediere Pelasgi, 'the Pelasgi have come back as usual,' and perhaps Vergil Aen. ix. 214 Solita aut si qua id fortuna uetabit. Ovid Her. iii. i 31 Est aliquid collum solitis tetigisse lacertis may have suggested Avianus' somewhat bolder variation. 6. Fröhner's qualis eam for qualis eram of MSS is more than probable. There is, perhaps, a touch of over-grandiloquence in eam, 'how I go on my way,' not quite suited to the plain directness of the rest of the speech, unless indeed Av. consciously imitates the heroic style of Mezentius, Aen. x. 88I (quoted by Barth) Venio moriturus et baec tibi porto Dona prius. nuntius iste, ' this messenger,' the arrow. refert, 'announces,' twice used by Vergil of a messenger, Aen, ii. 547 Referes ergo baec et nuntius ibis Pelidae genitori. xii. 75 Nuntius baec Idmon Pbrygio mea dicta tyranno Haud placitura refer (Cannegieter). 7. emissum ...ferrum, nominative as in Luc. iv. 545 Viscera non unus iamdudum transigit ensis. More commonly the subject of transigit (the present is the usual tense) is the striker, not the weapon, e. g. Stat. Theb. vii. 594, 5, viii. 477, 8 . uulnera most MSS, including, I think, $C$. But transigere uulnus, 'to deal a blow through,' is a construction of which I have found no example, and I therefore follow $A$, one of the earliest MSS, in writing uulnere. Such an ablative is frequent after transigere. 8. Praestrinxit, 'grazed,' and so Nonius cites Cic. Phil. ii. 40. 102 Cuius quiden (aratri) uomere portam Capuae paene praestrinxisti, where however the ninth century Vatican MS has m. pr. perstrixisti. Some of the best MSS of Avianus give here Perstrinxit, one, the remarkable Brit. Mus. $B$, pertinxit, a spelling which perhaps points to a perf. form stinxit, cf. praestigiae, and see Bücheler in Fleckeisen's Iahrbücher for 1872, p. 109 sqq. In Amm. Marc. xxxi. 3.7 A superciliis Gerasi fuminis ad usque Danubium Taifalorum terras praestringens muros altius erigebat the sense seems to be 'skirting.' 9. TNolliter with traheret, 'drew out gently,' to lighten the pain and diminish the flow of blood. Cf. tho medical use of mollis manus Quintil. ii. 4. 12 Ut remedia quae alicqui natura sunt aspera molli manu leniantur. So Cannegieter; but the Greek words $\chi \dot{\omega} \mu \dot{\nu} \nu$ oíatòs є́kpú $\phi \theta \eta$

Aéovtos íypais $\chi$ oníviv rather point to molliter fixum being taken together; the arrow had sunk gently into the yielding flesh of the beast. 10. A trepida... uulpe retenta. Quintil. vii. 2. 26 Clusinium Figulum filium Vrbiniae acie uicta in qua steterat, fugisse, iactatumque casibus uariis, retentum etiam a rege, tandem in Italiam ac patriam suam uenisse. trepida, 'dismayed 'from seeing what had befallen the tiger. retenta diu. The fox keeps the tiger talking a long time because he is anxious to learn whence comes the danger which in its turn will threaten himself. Very similarly Terence Phorm. v.6. 23 Pone aulprebendit pallio, resupinat: respicio, rogo Quam ob rem retineat me: ait esse uetitum intro ad eram accedere. Av. here deserts Babrius, who makes his fox encourage the lion ( $\theta$ apбєì каі̀ $\mu \epsilon ́ \nu є \iota \nu ~ к є \lambda \epsilon v o v ́ \sigma \eta s), ~$ the very opposite of the trepida uulpes of our fable. 11. I have written Nempe quis for Dum quis of $A C P$, Dumque quis of $B$. Among the other emendations of this v. Withof's Ecquis et for Dic quis et which is found in my Bodl. MS $X$ would be very like the '́ $\pi v \nu \theta \dot{u} v \epsilon \tau о$ тis $\mathfrak{\epsilon} \sigma \tau \iota$ каì $\pi$ ó $\theta \epsilon \nu$ $j_{j} \lambda \theta \epsilon \nu$ of Halm's Fab. Aesop. 423 (Weasel and Parrot). Fröhner's Vnde, quis has the same meaning and is nearer to the best MSS. uulnera ferret, here of dealing blows, and so Ovid Rem. 44, Trist. ii. 20, both in the combination uulnus opemque ferre. More often of receiving them, Ibis 256, Her. vi. 82, Met. ii. 286, xii. 313 . 12. ubĭnam, rare. Stat. S. ii. 1. 45 , and in the verse of Bibaculus ap. Suet. Gramm. ix Orbilius ubinam est, litterarum obliuio? 13. See on XVI. 12. It is possible that que connects the participle clause with the final verb coepit, as it connects respondens with docet there, if the MSS are to be followed. Cf. Aen. ix. 402, 3 Ocius adducto torquens bastile lacerto Suspiciens altam Lunam et sic uoce precatur. Or again it might be compared with Aen. x. 874 Aeneas agnouit enim laetusque precatur, where agnouit enim introduces laetusque precatur much as gemens introduces fractoque loqui m. coepit here. But it is not to be denied that at any rate in the present instance a simpler explanation is possible, namely, that que connects gemens with fracto murmure: 'the tiger groaning and with a faltering growl at last spoke.' So Wopkens, comparing XLII. 5 Inpiger bunc raptor mediamque secutus in urbem. fracto. Lucretius, describing the effect of fear iii. I 53 Videmus Sudoresque ita palloremque existere toto Corpore et infringi linguam uocemque aboriri, where Munro translates 'the tongue falter, the voice die away.' 14. solitas uoces, a somewhat strained plural, 'his wonted utterance,' or 'power of utterance.' dolor, 'pain of the wound.' 15. medio in aggere, 'confronted me on the road.' Aen. v. 273 Saepe uiae deprensus in aggere serpens, where Servius explains agger est media uiae eminentia, coaggeratis lapidibus strata. (Canneg.) conuenit. IX. 6. 16. The combination Nulla...forma... Quaeque...sit repetenda recurs XXXIII. 1, 2 Anser . . feta, Ouaque quae ... daret. See on XXXIII. 2. oculis olim repetenda, 'to be afterwards recalled by my eyes.' An Ovidianism, Pont. ii. 10. 5, 6 An tibi notitiam mora temporis eripit burum? Nec repetunt oculi signa uetusta tui? The gerundive has here the form of a simple fut. pass. participle. See above on XI. 12. 18. uirum, emphasized, 'strong man, ' man of might,' as in Sen. Epist. 98. 14 Cum uiro tibi negotium est.

Colum. vi. 9. a Quae medicina sub tecto fieri debet nec ante sanitatem bos emitti where Vegetius has dimittatur in pastum (Schneider ad loc.). error is rightly explained by Wopkens 'numquam aberrantes a se inuicem diuulsos fuisse.' Columella well illustrates the passage vi, 23.3 Nam id quoque semper crepusculo fieri debet, ut ad sonum bucinae pecus, si quod in siluis substiterit, septa repetere consuescat. Sic enim recognosci grex poterit numerusque constare si uelut ex militari disciplina intra stabulariorum castra manserint. See on IX. 2I. collatis inter se cornibus would more naturally mean 'joining horns in an encounter.' Here it is used of the four bullocks standing close to each other and presenting a formidable array of eight horn power. So collatis uiribus Plin. Ep. viii. 14. 17. Varro R. R. ii. 9.2 (cum sciam) tauros solere diuersos assistere clunibus continuatos, et cornibus facile propulsare lupos.

Fronto ad Caes. ii. 18 illa cotidie tua Lorium uentio. Lamprid. Vit. Alex. Seueri 35 meliorum retro principum. Symm. Epist. i. 27 tanta retro familiaritate is very like our passage. This view is supported by a gloss in the Treves MIS ante fidem, marg. ante conditan. Otherwise ante might be explained of the preliminary distrust which involves and is contrasted with the ruin that comes of listening to evil suggestions.

1. Horrentes dumos introduces as a plural what afterwards figures as a singular 9 tibi, in Ille refert. The same change in a different form appears in locamur in 7 followed by $I_{n}$ me in 8 . pulcherrima. Verg. 'Saying it was a pitiful strite that was waged with bushes, that had no title that equalized them on the ground of merit.' dumis is my correction of the MS reading cunctis, which written cuntis would easily be mistaken for it. Wopkens' defence of the MS reading 'quoscurnque nullus of merita consociaret honor, inter hos indigne de meritis certari' is slightly awkward, though in a writer of this period certainly possible. If $Q_{\text {Hod }}$ is relained (it is found in $A C P$ ) we must with Schenkl explain cunctis baberi as abomnibus iudicari and Quod as quia, a poor meaning quite unworthy of Avianus. certamen haberi, as in Ovid M. xiii. i59 Ergo operum quoniann nudum certamen babetur. Val. Max, viii. 7. Ext. 12 Soppocies gloriosum cum rerum natura certamen babuit. dumis, dative, depends immediately on cortamen. 4. meriti is a very seductive emendation. 5. But though deducta uox, deductum carmen in the sense of 'thin' are found several times (see Macrob. S. vi. 4. 12), it is not often that the word is applied to the body, as here. 'Slim'perhaps is our nearest equivalent. In Avianus' time deductus was inflected regularly as an adjective: e.g. deductior paulo numerus in a Rescript of the Emperors Valens Gratianus and Valentinian cod. Theodos. xiii. Tit, iii. §Ir. 7. 'And when I am set amidships on the barque's open floor, on me is hung the canvas that the breeze unfurls.' Here the future contingency cum succidet membra securis is mentally realized as a fact accomplished, and Quam uelles = 'how glad you would have been:' Quam uellem is common in the letters of Symmachus, e.g. i. 5. tunc, 'at the moment' of being felled. The v. is a close imitation of Mart. Spect. viii. 2 Quam cuperes pinnas nunc babuisse tuas.

This fable has its double in another of the Aesopian collection 231 Halm. There a dog lying asleep in front of a house, and on the point of being eaten by a wolf, begs for mercy, on the plea that whereas at present he is thin and lean, he will soon get fatter with the good things at his master's wedding. The wolf spares him, and after a few days returns and finds the dog sleeping on the top of the house. He reminds him of his promise; and the dog taunts him with his folly in believing he can be simple enough to sleep again in front of the house after his former danger. Cf. Otto Crusius de Babrii aetate p. 204.

The Bodleian Paraphrast does not include Babr. vi.

1. praedam might be the bait, as it seems to be in Ovid Hal. 34, 5 Atque ubi praedam Pendentem saetis auidus rapit (Polypus). But the words of Mosell. 254 Nec mora et excussam stridenti uerbere praed am, Dexter in obliquum raptat puer, where it is used of a fish which has just taken the hook. So Ovid Met, xiii. 936. From the same point of view the fisherman is called praedo Auson. Mosell. 282. saeta, 'a horse-hair line.' Ovid Hal. 35, Mart. i. 55. 9, x. 30. 16, Auson. Mosell. 253 crispoque tremori Vibrantis saetae nutans consentit barunto. 2. Exigui. Babrius is equally indefinite : the prose version has $\mu a v i \delta i \sigma^{\prime}$, a sprat.' As early as the Odyssey (xii. 252) the fisherman is Figere uulnus is found in Mart. i. 60. \& of a lion biting bullocks; $f$. mortem in Seneca Herc. Oet. 519 of an arrow piercing mortally. It is in this latter sense it is used here; the wound is pierced, i. e. made by the piercing of the hook. ab ore, 'from,' i.e. 'through the mouth'asin Ovid Her, vi. 82 Non exspectato uulnus $a b$ boste tulit. tulit, sc. piscis, a change of subject.

 which the Athoan codex substitutes $\ddot{\eta} \pi \sigma^{\sigma} \sigma o v \mu \epsilon \pi \omega \lambda \dot{j} \sigma \epsilon \epsilon s ;$ Either seems to require dona, as damna can hardly mean 'costs,' and so 'damage' or 'price.' Wopkens' view that ex nostro corpore = 'from the loss of my body,' i. e. by giving me up and restoring me to freedom, is harsh, but not impossible. 7. Nunc, 'as it is.' Catull. xxi. ro Nunc ipsum id doleo, quod esurire Mellitus puer et sitire discet. The Brit. Mus. codex $B$ has Hannc, possibly a mistake for Hunc. 'Such as you see me here my mother bore me under rocky caverns,' i. e. in contradistinction from the full-grown rules for fishing in rocky, sandy or open waters ( 85 sqq .), distinguishing the kinds of fish which haunt each. Fish that haunt rocky water were called saxatiles. Colum. viii. 16. 8 Optime saxosum mare nominis sui pisces nutrit, qui scilicet, quod in petris stabulentur, saxatiles dicti sunt, ut merulae turdique nec minus melanuri. 8. Fudit, 'spawned,' Babrius' $\neq \pi \tau v \sigma$ '. tuis mensis, ' for your table.' Symm. Ep. i. 14 In tuis mensis saepe uersatus ... uumquam boc genus piscium deprebendi in a letter to Ausonius praising his description of the fish in his Mosella. The plural probably expresses the general idea of dining; the dinner recurs and the dining-table is renewed. Or, as A. Palmer suggests on Hor. S. ii. 2. 122, several tables were used, and hence the plural. 11. Protinus softens down to a minimum the interval which must elapse before the young fish can grow big and fat. 'A moment and I shall have gorged on the waters of the vasty deep and be returning of my own accord all the fatter to your rod.' depastus, deponent, as in Claud. de Sext. Cons. Honorii 239 frondesque licet depastus amaras. caerula. Canneg. quotes Auson. Epist. iii. 13 Remipedes (ducks) lato populantes caerula rostro. 12. Pinguior.

Yet Av. may mean merely that accidents are variable and difficult to count upon or manage, 'intractable,' as Seneca speaks Epist. ror. 9 of uarietas mobilitasque casuum. Withof paraphrases 'uices uocat difficiles quod sint periculosae et incertae, quibus difficulter aliquis possit confidere quarumque exitum nemo sibi facile polliceatur.' Ammianus Marcellinus xxv. 8.4 discrimine per difficiles casus extracti uses diff. casus to mean 'arduous casualties'; and again xxxi. 15. 7 reputantes difficiles Martis euentus. 15. miserum, 'a wretched folly': as we say pitiable. A. Gellius N. A. ii. 29 gives a version of this 'apologue of the Phrygian Aesop' in Latin, the language of which perhaps retains some of the words used by the poet Ennius in his translation into trochaic septenarii, of which Gellius quotes two lines (see below on 14). As it differs considerably from the Babrian version I give it entire from the new edition of Martin Hertz 1883 :

Auicula est parua, nomen est cassita. Habitat nidulaturque in segetibus, id ferme temporis, ut appetat messis pullis iam iam plumantibus. Ea cassita in sementibus forte congesserat tempestiuiores : propterea frumentis flauescentibus pulli etiam tunc inuolucres erant. Dum igitur ipsa iret cibum pullis quaesitum, monet eos, ut, si quid ibi rei nouae fieret dicereturue, animaduerterent idque uti sibi, ubi redisset, nuntiarent. Dominus postea segetum illarum filium adulescentem uocat, et 'uidesne' inquit 'haec ematuruisse et manus iam postulare ? idcirco die crastini, ubi primum diluculabit, fac amicos eas et roges, ueniant, operamque mutuam dent et messim hanc nobis adiuuent.' Haec ubi ille dixit, et discessit. Atque ubi redit cassita, pulli tremibundi, trepiduli circumstrepere orareque matrem, ut iam statim properet, inque alium locum sese asportet: 'nam dominus,' inquiunt, 'misit qui amicos roget, uti luce oriente ueniant et metant.' Mater iubet eos otioso animo esse: 'si enim dominus' inquit, ' messim ad amicos reicit ${ }^{1}$, crastino seges non metetur, neque necessum est, hodie uti uos auferam.' ' $\mathrm{Die}^{\text {' }}$ inquit 'postero mater in pabulum uolat. Dominus, quos rogauerat, opperitur. Sol feruit et fit nihil; it dies, et amici nulli eunt. Tum ille rursum ad filium: "amici isti magnam partem" inquit, "cessatores sunt. Quin potius imus et cognatos adfinesque nostros oramus, ut assint cras temperi ad metendum ?" ' Itidem hoc pulli pauefacti matri nuntiant. Mater hortatur, ut tum quoque sine metu ac sine cura

[^7]sint, cognatos adfinesque nullos ferme tam esse obsequibiles ait, ut ad laborem capessendum nihil cunctentur et statim dicto oboediant: 'uos modo,' inquit, 'aduertite, si modo quid denuo dicetur.' Alia luce orta, auis in pastum profecta est. Cognati et adfines operam, quam dare rogati sunt, supersederunt. Ad postremum igitur dominus filio: 'ualeant,' inquit, 'amici cum propinquis. Afferes primo luci falces duas; unam egomet mihi et tu tibi capies alteram et frumentum nosmetipsi manibus nostris cras metemus.' Id ubi ex pullis dixisse dominum mater audiuit: 'tempus,' inquit, 'est cedendi et abeundi; fiet nunc dubio procul quod futurum dixit. In ipso enim iam uertitur cuia res est, non in alio unde petitur.' Atque ita cassita nidum migrauit, seges a domino demessa est.

Crusius (de Babrii aetate p. 204) well observes that the Ennian version is superior to the Babrian in its dramatic grouping into three acts.

There is considerable difference of opinion as to the bird which figures as protagonist in the fable. Babrius makes it a lark ${ }^{1}$, and describes its young as crested. Gellius calls it cassita, a word seemingly ä $\pi$. єip $\mu$. but identified rightly it would seem with galerita, which Pliny, H. N. xi. 12I In capite paucis animalium nec nisi uolucribus apices . . . praeterea paruae aui quae ab illo galerita appellata quondam, postea Gallico uocabulo etiam legioni nomen dedit alaudae, describes as a crested or tufted lark. The words of Pliny paruae aui coincide closely with Avianus' Paruula ales, and it might seem that this settled the question. But one of the earliest and most reliable MSS, the Paris $C$, prefixes to the fable the words DE Lvscinia; and Isidorus xii. 7.37 describes this bird in words which suit Babrius' $\frac{\text { т } \tau}{}$ хара $\rho \rho \iota \omega$ cantu suo significare solet surgentis exortum diei, quasi lucinia. Eadem et acredula. Similarly the Balliol Glossary Acredula luscinia auis modica. Now this looks as if it might be the word disguised in the MSS as credula in 5 ; acredula is written credula in Reyfferscheid's Brussels MS of the Carmen de Philomela 15 Vere calente nouos componit acredula cantus, Matutinali tempore rurirulans ${ }^{3}$; and if so we may perhaps suppose that in Avianus' time the word luscinia or acredula was no longer identified with the nightingale (pbilomela, sce de Philom. 45), but meant a bird which sang at daybreak and heralded morning.

1. mandauerat, 'had consigned.' Ovid Her. v. 215 Quid barenae semina mandas? The word is very common in Claudian. 2. It is not easy to pronounce whether caespite is the ground on which the corn-crop rises, or the lower part of the stalk, which, as near the root and close to the ground, would remain green after the upper part, including the ear, was ripe and yellow (flaua). In the former case caespite would be a local ablative 'rose on the green soil '; in the latter an abl. of circumstance 'the yellow corn-crop rose erect with a green root-stem.' The question is not corn, as in the green grass. Caespes is perpetually used in Ennodius (A. D. 473-52x) of the young blade just risen from the root, as the passages cited in Hartel's Index prove. Dict. viii. p. 448 H . Nouellum caespitem fotu quo cuncta fructificare soles adtolle. ix. p. 453 Disce iam nunc uerborum luxuriem artis falce truncare, ut nouellus caespes sub ferri disciplina proficiat. xiii. p.
 $\dot{a} v \mathrm{a}_{\dot{d}} \delta \omega \nu$; but erroneously, as not only metre, but the subsequent mention of the lark in 8,17 show. Besides the $\chi$ apa $\delta$ pıós was a water-bird. Aristoph. Av. II 41 oi

${ }^{2}$ This must be the galeritus, quod in capitc habict plumam clatam of Varro L. L. v. 76, cf. Seren. Sammon. 575 Mande graleritam wolucrem quam nomine dicunt.
${ }^{3}$ Cf. our 'ritooralooral.'

466 Habeat caespes radici obsecundans poma quae tribuat. Av. himself in XVI. 7 applies the word to the lower extremity of a reed, from which the stalks rise: and so Vergil G. iv. 273. The difficulty is perhaps due to the same straining after antithetic effect which is seen in Merobaudes' nigro candentes aethere terras, of snowy ground under a dark sky (v. 2 of the hexameter fragment on Aetius' victories). 3. fragili culmo, abl. after decerpere, as in Met. v. 536. 5. Sed as in XXII. 9 introduces a new stage in the narrative. 'But, you must know.' If it has any adversative force, it is in relation to the clause commencing at 7 , as if the construction were contracted from Sed-nam uox turbauit nidos-hos mater uetuit $d$. inplumes nidos, 'unfledged nestlings.' Verg. G. iv. 512 of a nightingale's nest robbed by a countryman, fetus, quos durus arator Obseruans nido inplumis detraxit. As here nidos, Vergil Aen. xii. 475 Pabula parua legens nidisque loquacibus escas. credula MSS is either acredula, in which case Av. apostrophises the bird, see my note on Cat. liv, 2 or an epithet agreeing with uox possibly sedula, which is found in a Brit. Mus. MS (b) and would well suit the business-like diligence of the farmer (sedulus agricola Plin. H. N. xvii. Ior). 6. Suasit et e is my conj. for Suaserat et for which $X$ gives Suaserat e. The preposition seems absolutely required, though fugere is sometimes constructed with the simple abl. See on Cat. xxxvii. in. continuare fugam, 'to take to flight without a moment's delay.' Sen. de Ira ii. 36. 5 Multi continuauerunt irae furorem, 'have carried on their anger into madness,' 'passed immediately from anger into madness.' Pacat. Paneg. xxxix Exercitus spatio lucis unius Illyrico continuauit Aquileiam, 'marched from Illyricum to Aquileia without stopping.' contimuare accelerare is a gloss in the Treves MS.

Cautior, 'more wary than her young.' 8. 'Why, what good will come of strangers' help?' 9. operam mandauit. Stat. Non proelia mandet, Sed gerat, 'not commit to others, but conduct himself,' a good illustration of our fable. 10. inde, all the safer in consequence. See on VII. 18. 12. ueram, the true hand of the master, not the false hands of the recusant friends. saeuam, the reading of $O$ and some of Cannegieter's MSS, points I think rather to seram than seruam. But it is in every way weaker than ueram. 13. o miseri, compassionately, in reference to their enforced migration. 14.
 remarkable that this fable has no epimythion or moral. Gellius has preserved the Ennian epimythion: Hoc erit tibi argumentum semper in promptu situm. Ne quid exspectes amicos quod tute agere possies. There was a rustic proverb, Frons occipitio prior, 'things go better in the master's presence than behind his back,' Cato R. R. 4, Plin. H. N. xviii. 31.

This fable is not in our Babrius nor in any of Halm's prose versions.

1. ambiguas, ' uncertain,' and which he therefore wished to ascertain in advance (praediscere) to guide him in answering their prayers. praediscere, infin. of purpose after misit, 'sent Phoebus to learn.' Common from the earliest Latin to the latest, especially in Plautus, Terence, Lucretius (Roby) and writers that approach the language of common life; not unfrequent in Augustan and post-Augustan poetry. Wagner on Trin. iv. 3. 8, Sonnenschein on Most. i. 1. 64, Hartel Index to Ennodius, p. 676).
2. diuersis, 'imploring the gods' help for opposite vows.' uotis is better explained as dative if numina, the reading of the best MSS, is kept. It seems doubtful whether poscere numen can mean 'to beseech a god,' though Conington on Aen. i. 666 Ad te confugio et supplex tua numina posco appears to favour that view. Even in so late a poet as Claudian, Rapt. Pros, i. 66 Posce Iouem, dabitur coniunx, a second accusative of the thing asked for is casily supplied from the accompanying clause dabitur coniunx. Two of my Bodleian MSS have munera which is certainly easier, and may be right, as numen munus are constantly confused.
3. liuidus, 'jealous,' for inuidus of MSS is Withof's excellent conj. accepted by Lachm. Mamertinus Paneg. Iuliani xv Si quis boc liuidus iactitat, ipso tempore refutatur. Seren. Samm. 1054 Vel quicumque tuo carpetur liuidus auctu. 5. If His quoque se is read, quoque merely carries on the story as in XVIII. 5, 'And so to them.' I have preferred to follow the S. Gallen fragm. His sese. medium, as mediator. Verg. Aen. vii. 536 Dum paci medium se offert (Optulit). 6. I have followed the suggestion of my Bodleian $X$, which has precibus confiteretur written by the first hand, with the reading of the other MSS ut peteretur superscribed. If I mistake not, I have cleared up the difficulty by my conj. precibus cum peteretur, ait, Praestant di facilis, ' when he was assailed by their prayers, replied, The gods are kind and grant fulfilment.' Lachmann's et 'precibus Iuppiter aecus' ait 'Praestandi facilis' though at first sight brilliant, does not seem to me right. It is not in Av.'s manner to accumulate two adjectives both predicates without a verb expressed: and Praestandi facilis is a construction more in the style of Prudentius. 7. Praestant. Ovid F. iv. 149 Vt tegat hoc celetque uiros Fortuna uirilis Praestat et boc paruo ture rogata facit. quae namque seems preferable to nam quaeque, although the use of quisque for quicumque in writers of this period and in the Digest is indubitable (Dräger i. 84). Even Symmachus has it Ep. i. 58 quisque bonae frugis est $=$ quicumque, and cf. Wölfflin Gemination im Lateinischen p. 450. 8. congeminata, 'doubled,' or rather 'dupled.' Apul. de Dogm. Plat. ix Substantiam mentis buius numeris et modis confici congeminatis ac multiplicatis. 9. longa, 'far-reaching.' Somewhat similar is Catullus' longa poena xl. 8. iecur, which Horace makes the seat of lust, is here the seat of cupidity. Cannegieter aptly quotes Claud. de iv Cons. Honorii $24^{8}$ At sibi cuncta petens, nil conlatura Cupido, In iecur et tractus imos conpulsa recessit. nequeat MSS, justifiably, as cupido suggests the subject cupidus. 'But since far-reaching greed cannot be contented, he (i. e. the covetous man) put off his vow.' 10. Distulit, 'Put off (realizing) the prayer which, when addressed to the gods, brought only new loss,' i.e. which ultimately involved the loss of both his eyes. Lachmann's dona is simpler and very probable; in noua dona would mean the additional bounty which the gods would have to pay to the second petitioner, viz. twice as much as the first had received. admotas preces, always in the sense of addressing a prayer. Ovid Met. vi. 689 Admouique preces quarum me dedecet usus? Pont. iii. 7. $3^{6}$ Quas admorint non ualuisse preces (quoted by Schenkl). Curt. v. 10. 14 Preces deinde suppliciter admotae Dareum ... Aere coegerunt. noua, of which he had no experience before. The word is in opposition to the expected gain.

11. 'Not doubting that his hopes would rise by what the other wished.' confidens, followed by pres. infin. as in Caesar B. G. ii. 30 Quibusnam manibus tanti oneris turrim in muro sese collocare confiderent? which is nearly the same as B. C. ii. 31 Qua fiducia et opere et natura loci munitissima castra expugnari posse confidimus? So fretus in the hexameters inscribed on the basis of the Obelisk dug up in the Circus Maximus and erected by Pope Sixtus V in front of the Lateran Basilica, v. so in Castalio's edition (Var. Lect. p. 44, ed. Rom. 1594) At. DOMinvs. MVNDi. CONSTANTIVS. OMNIA. FRETVS. Cedere. virtyti. 13. Ille, 'the other,' the inuidus. captantem, 'grasping' at the reward that was meant for himself: for the jealous man would in the natural course of things get twice the amount of the covetous man's desire. He was bidding for something he could not be sure of. 14. Supplicium, 'to be mulcted in his own body.' ouans, 'triumphant' in the opportunity of turning the tables on the other, and making him lose twice as much as himself. 15. 'He asked to live with one eye put out, on condition the other should double the punishment and lose both.' extinctus lumine uno, a variation on the ordinary construction, lumen extinctum which Ovid has Met. i. 721 of an eye put out. sic for $u$ t of MSS seems to satisfy metre and give more point to v. I6. Orientius i. 3 II Sic miseros uindex semper populabitur ignis, Vt semper seruet pabula laeta sibi. degeret is perhaps an error for degat ut, though there is something harsh in the sound of the repeated ut in the next v . In a writer so late as Av. a change from historic present (petit) to imperf. and then back again to present is not very surprising. Even Propertius v. 5. II, 12 has Quippe et Collinas ad fossam mouerit berbas, Stantia currenti diluerentur aqua. 16. hoc, 'this amount,' viz. of one eye. 17. sapiens, 'taught wisdom' (Canneg.). 18. Inuidiae malum, 'the curse of jealousy,' i.e. what an accursed thing jealousy was. So Claudian Epig. 40 Esuriens pauper telis incendor amoris Inter utrumque malum deligo pauperiem, 'the curse of Poverty, the curse of Love.' Fab. Perottin. ix. in Fassa est naturae malum, the hen's irresistible tendency to scratch up earth. The opposite bonum 'blessing' in Symm. Ep. i. 59 Amicitiae bonum. ipse, 'himself' announced, as he had himself witnessed. 19. prouentis iniquis. Non. 52 I Prouentum etiam malarum rerum dici ueteres uoluerunt. Lucilius lib. xxvi dein (1. deinde) quae adeo male me accipiunt decimae et proueniunt male. The masc. prouentus is common, especially in such combinations as prosperiorem prouentum, lucrosum prosperumque prouentum (Apul. xi. 20, iv. 27 , see Hildebrand on x .26 ): the neuter prouentum is rather rare. Here iniquis determines the character of prouentis, 'luckless issues' = 'miscarriages,' 'disappointments.' 20. 'In its exultation is unhappy enough to long for its own harm.'

BABR. xxx.

This fable forms a curious contrast to the proverb Non ex omni ligno debet Mercurius exsculpi Apul. de Magia xliii; perhaps, pointing to a time when the worship of images was in growing disrepute, as indeed it was forbidden by Christianity.

There is no prose version of this fable; but the last verse of it recurs in another and less known fable 55 Halm . There a man wishing to test the Delphian oracle hides a young sparrow in his robe and asks 'is the thing I have in my hands alive or dead '? intending to kill the sparrow, if the oracle answered 'alive,' and expose it to view, if the answer were 'dead.' Then the god, detecting his malicious purpose, replies: 'Have done. It is for yourself to determine whether the thing is living or dead' ( $\epsilon \cdot \nu$ бoi $\gamma \dot{\alpha} \rho$ 光 $\sigma \tau \iota$,

This is, I think, the most difficult of the Avianianian collection, if indeed it is by Avianus. It is also one of the least finished in point of diction, e.g. 2 fecerat expositum esse, 3,4 the awkward interlacing of clauses, 6-10 the extreme obscurity of the language, which induced Lachmann to doubt the genuineness of 8,9 , and led Bährens to one of his most infelicitous attempts at restoration: lastly, the difficulty of connecting the epimythion 13 , 14 with the fable.

1. referens, all MSS rightly, whether the word means 'representing,' ' modelling,' a sense of which I have found no exact example, for referre uultum, ora, parentem etc., are only approximately similar, or, as is more likely, 'conveying from the marble-block the new form of a Bacchus,' 'converting a marble-block into a handsome Bacchus.' The idea of change which is here assigned to referre seems to exist elsewhere e.g. Pacat. Paneg. xxix Cum damnatorum frena tractassent, pollutas poenali manus contactu ad sacra referebant, i. e. transferred. 2. 'Had put up the god for sale.' A most awkward circumlocution for exposuerat. Cic. de Off. iii. 12. 5 I $A d$ uexi exposui uendo meum non pluris quam ceteri. Mart. ix. 59. 8 Expositumque alte pingue poposcit ebur. Expositum fecerat esse, i. e. fecerat expositum esse. Facio, followed by the present infin. is shown by Dräger ii. p. 393 to be common in late Latin, but he quotes no instance of the perfect. Thielmann however (Archiv für Latein. Lexicographic iii. p. 178) shows that the perfect infin. after facere is found, though much more rarely, in good writers. Verg. Aen. viii. 630 Fecerat . . . Procubuisse lupam. Ovid Met. vi. 75 Fecit . . . stare . . . ferire . . . exiluisse. xiii, 69 Facit . . . dare . . . cecidisse ... ferri . . .cremari . . exire . . ducere. 3. Nobilis. Such men would be likely to have elaborate funcral monuments (Canneg.). funesta in sede with compositurus erat. The tomb is called sedes as the place where the body rests. Hence in inscriptions it is commonly i. q. sepulchrum. Auson. Prof, xii. 6 Schenkl Esto placidus et quietis manibus sedem foue. xxvii. I I Sedem sepulcbri seruat inmotus cinis. Epitaph. Heroum xxiv. I Hic Priami non est tumulus, nec condor in illa Sede. (Hildebrand on Apul. M. iv. I8.) 4. Mercari cupiens is not only out of its place, but awkward in itself as an expression. The writer, perhaps not Avianus, meant mercari uoluit ut componeret in s. sepulcbri, which would otherwise be mercari uoluit compositurus. The form of the fut. participle seems to have suggested erat and the change to Mereari cupiens followed. The declining cense of Latin symax is particularly perceptible in the use of the pres. participle. Thus in 1 referens = qui rettulerat. compositurus, 'intended to arrange.' 5. The sentence is loosely attached to v. 4. Formally ut seems determined by compositurus, but the meaning is not so much that the man intended to arrange the statue with a view of making an offering of it to some temple, as that he wished to purchase it with that purpose. adoratis, most MSS, perhaps rightly. Verg. Aen. iii. 8& Templa dei saxo uenerabar structa uetusto. Inscript. ap. Muratori iii. p. 1638, quoted by van Goens de Cepotaphiis
p. IO7 QVOD. CREDIS. TEMPLVM. QVOD. FORTE. VIATOR. ADORAS. POMPTILLAE. CINERES. OSSAQVE. PARVA. TEGIT. Rutilius Namatianus, addressing Rome, says, i. 50 Non procul a caelo per tua templa sumus. Apul. de Magia lvi Si fanum aliquod praetereat, nefas babet adorandi gratia manum labris admouere. numina, of a single god, as in Verg. Aen. i. 666. See Dräger i. p. 7. [My conj. Alter ut auratis inferret might be defended by Ovid's words F.i. 77 Flamma nitore suo templorum uerberat aurum.] He had made a vow to place an image in a temple. Redderet, correlative to debita, 'pay the debt of a vow.' 7. ait, the statue. 'It is for you now to make a two-fold forecast of the future of your wares, when two unequal offers put a price upon your gift; and to forecast, it may be, consigning me to the dead, it may be, if you prefer, to the gods; perhaps converting me into an ornament on a tomb, perhaps into a divinity. omen, if the fable has come down to us entire here $=$ ' forecast,' i.e. little beyond a mere balancing of two possibilities still equally uncertain. Possibly a sense somewhat like this is to be found in And. i. 2. 29 Ea lege atque omine, 'on these terms and with this forecast of the future.' But the Babrian version makes it probable that one or perhaps more distichs have been lost, in which the god appeared in a dream to the maker of the statue, and then spoke vv. 7-12. The St. Gallen Glossary recently edited by Prof. M. Warren, has omen quod bomo somniatur, auspicium, auguria maiora. Then Nunc instead of referring to Cum spes, etc., will mean 'after my thus appearing to you in a dream.' 8. spes, here of opposite 'bids.' dispar with spes rather than with pretium. 9. Et MSS. The construction is facies omen de mercibus et (seu) malis me defunctis seu diuis tradere. From seu malis another seu is to be supplied to the former clause. A second, but harsher, possibility would be to supply trades out of seu malis tradere. 10. seu uelis is too favorite a commonplace to be changed arbitrarily into seu posuisse (Withof), or siue locasse (Fröhner). Veget. i. & Siue equitem siue peditem sagittarium uelis imbuere siue scutatum. 11. sacri for facti (fati) of MSS scems more probable than Baccbi, which is found in the Paraphrast. Indeed one of the earliest MSS, Fröhner's $P$, has sati, and the change of $f$ and $s$ is one of the commonest. Moreover the Treves MS glosses the words magni reuerentia fati by bonor diuini cultus. By sacri I understand a religious observance, here the cultus of Bacchus 'in your disposal lies the respect paid to a solemn act of religion.' Bährens' fani hardly accounts for the variants facti fati sati. 12 eadem. The synizesis of ea, eo, eas, eos, in the cases of idem is proved by Ramsay (Latin Prosody p. 122) for Lucretius, Vergil, Propertius, but it does not seem to occur in Ausonius, Claudian, or Prudentius. funera nostra, 'my deathwarrant' ; to consign me to a tomb. The erection of statues is constantly mentioned in Inscriptions in connexion with sepulchral monuments. C.I.L. iv. I 130 Locum sepulturae statuam ponendam. 1286 Locum sepulturae impensam funeris clupeum statuam pedestrem. Av. is very far from the happy con-
 This epimythion is quite on a par in its obscurity with the rest of the fable. The best MSS agree in praestare, not prodesse, and as the fable turns on the doubts of a seller, it seems probable that the word is used in its technical meaning of securing a buyer against loss. Cic. de Off. iii. I6. 65 Ac de iure quidem praediorum sanctum apud nosest iure ciuili, ut in iis uendendis uitia dicerentur, quae nota essent uendilori. Nam cum ex duodecim tabulis satis esset ea praestari ('should be made good,' i. e. the buyer should be secured against loss, Holden ad loc.) quae essent lingua nuncupata, quae qui infitiatus esset, dupli poenam subiret, a iuris consultis etiam reticentiae poena est constituta. Quidquid enim esset in praedio uitii, id statuerunt, si uenditor sciret, nisi nominatim dictum esset, praestari oportere. Cf. Roby on Justinian p. 156, where the legal uses of praestare are classified. If this is the sense of praestare, it fixes that of nocuisse, to be injuring a buyer by selling something without mentioning its defects or the liabilities which make it less valuable. The point of the fable, on this view, lies in the absolute control which the seller has over the thing sold: he can make a god of his article or condemn it to the service of the tomb at pleasure. The moral of which is that vendors would do well to utilize their opportunity and turn their goods to the best advantage. Yet it is also possible that the writer of the distich may mean ' I address this fable to those who have it in their power to be generous or to injure indifferently. Let them weigh well beforehand which they intend to do, and what will come of either line.' This is simpler; but praestare, though frequently used of giving a bounty (Mart. v. 52. I Quae mibi praestiteris memini, semperque tenebo, 3 tua dona, 7 quamuis ingentia dona) is in that meaning almost necessarily followed by an accusative expressed or implied. 14. An...seu. Auson. Epitaph. 3 I. 5 Schenkl Nec quisquam Marius seu Marcius anne Metellus Hic iaceat, certis nouerit indiciis. nocuisse after uelit is quite regular. Dräger, who reviews the instances i. 230, 231, says no case of this so-called aoristic infin. is found in Cicero, Caesar, Sallust, Tacitus. The combination of it with the present infin. (praestare) is probably due, partly to metre, partly to the fact that in the legal sense found in this passage praesto, praestare not praestiti, praestitisse is the almost invariable form.

2. nobilis with Venator, 'a huntsman of fame,' who might fairly contend with a lion of the finest breed. Cannegieter's lengthy citation of passages showing that the lion is often called noble or generous (XXXVII. 14 nobile murmur, Plin. H. N. viii. 50 Illa nobilior animi significatio, Ovid Trist. iii. 5. 33-6, Mart. i. 48. 4, Claud. de Mallii Consul. 305, to which add Plin. viii. 48 Animalis omnium generosissimi. 50 Generositas in periculis maxime deprebenditur), cannot outweigh the counter-arguments of metre and Avianian usage. In the eleven instances where Av, uses atque there is not one in which it stands second word in the sentence; it invariably begins the sentence or clause to which it belongs; in nine of the eleven instances it is the first word of a pentameter. The rhythm is equally decisive in joining nobilis with the first half of the line, not the last. 3. perpetuum, 'lasting,' as the quarrel was of long-standing. 4. continuo fronte, for continuo forte of MSS seems justified as an archaism by the passages cited in Gell. xv. 9 from the comic writer Caecilius and MI. Cato, in Festus p. 286 M. from Cato, in Nonius 204 from Titinius Pacuvius Cato Caecilius; as a technical word Forcellini quotes Vitruv. x. 17. 7 Quod autem est ad axona quod appellatur frons transuersarius. Here it would be specially appropriate, as the continuous frontage of the tomb would give room for a sculptured group of some size. Auson. Parent. 2. 12 Frontibus boc scrip-

Schenkl defends the MS reading, translating ' they came on the instant to a high tomb.' But the juxtaposition contimuo forte is very weak, and the sense given to continuo not supported by Av.'s use of the word elsewhere. sepulchra, here of a single monument. Catull. lxiv. 368 Alta Polyxenia madefient caede sepulchra. 5. docta manus, 'an artist hand.' Stat. S. iii. 3. $200 T_{e}$ lucida saxa, Te similem doctae referet mibi linea cerae: Nunc ebur et fuluum uultus imitabitur aurum. flectentem colla, 'bowing or drooping his neck submissively,' here used of the vanquished beast. So flectere poplitem, of a kneeler, Pacat. Paneg. xlii. More usually fectere colla (equi) is said of a rider managing his horse with bit or rein. Verg. Aen. i. 156, Ovid Pont. ii. 9. 58. 6. Fecerat . . . procubuisse from Vergil. Aen. viii. 630 Fecerat et uiridi fetam Mauortis in antro Procubuisse lupam, 'had represented lying prostrate.' 7, 8. MSS give Scilicet afirmans (infirmans B) pictura teste superbum Se fieri? Two readings seem to be suggested by this, according as affirmans or infirmans is adopted. (i) Scilicet affirmas pictura teste superbum Te fieri? 'Can you really assert, when there is a picture to give evidence, that you have a right to be elated? Why, it shows the lion dead.' (2) S. infirmas p.t.s. Defieri? 'I sưppose, you deny, when there is a painting to prove it, that pride (lit. the proud one) may fail'? Scilicet is, I think, to be retained at all risks, as introducing with no need of further preliminaries an ironical question. affirmans MSS for affirmas reverses the more usual substitution of -as -es for -ans -ens. If infirmas is read, cf. Rosc. Com. xv. 45 testis fidem infirmare which agrees very well with pictura teste. But there is some harshness in constructing infirmare with an infinitive. superbum. Lachm,'s conj. supernum is possible, though not a very good word in the sense required. 8. If Defier is read, De Vit's Forcellini will supply parallels, e. g. Gell. xx. 8. 4 Eadem autem ipsa, quae crescente luna gliscunt, deficiente contra luna defiunt (of oysters losing flesh). nam I consider to be part of the hunter's speech. It might also be explained (less well) as a parenthetical remark by the poet. 9. Ille, 'the lion.' graues, probably 'downcast,' from shame. Thus Statius S. ii. 5. 14, 15 speaking of lions ashamed by the defeat of Domitian's leo mansuetus in the Amphitheatre says Tunc cunctis cecidere iubae, puduitque relatum Aspicere et totas duxere in lumina frontes. The words graues oculi are found elsewhere in various senses ( $x$ ) of eyes heavy with sleep, Prop. ii. 29. 16, Val. Fl. iv. 18; (2) heavy with the approach of death, sinking, Verg. Aen. iv. 688 Illa graues oculos connta attollere. Stat. Theb.i. $54^{6}$ graues oculos languentiaque ora of the cut off head of Medusa, and again v. 502 of a tired child falling asleep: xi. 558 Cerno graues oculos atque ora natantia leto ; (3) with the heavy look of debauchery Cic. Cum Senatui Grat. Egitvi. $1_{3} ;(4)$ seemingly $=$ 'serious,' though the passage is disputed, Apul. vi. 15 Nec Proudentiae bonae graues oculos innocentis animae latuit aerumna. In the passage of Av. graues seems to be partly determined by retorquens; the eyes are turned heavily earthwards and only lifted from their position by an effort to the pictured counterfeit on the tomb. The ania gives a slight notion of contempt for the unreality of the presentation, Ovid M. iii. 668 Quem circa tigres simulacraque inania lyncum Pictarumque iacent fera corpora pantherarum. retorquens. Claud. Rapt. Pros. i. ig I quoties oculos ad tecta retorsit.
11. From Vergil Aen, i. 136 Tantane uos generis tenuit fiducia uestri? which same passage, as Castalio long ago remarked (Var. Lect. p. 75, ed. 1594) has been twice imitated by Claudian, Bell. Gild. 330, B. Get. 122. generis uestri ' of your buman origin': uestri of course includes mankind in general. 'Your origin as man.' 12. si cupis, see on VII. 16, and cf. the use of pugnare with an infin. in Cic.

Acad. ii. 21.68 where see Reid. 13. caperet, 'admitted of,' 'were equal to.' So Cannegieter, quoting Claud. Laud. Stil. iii. 132 Cuizs nee spatium uisus, nec corda decorem, Nec laudem uox ulla capit. sollertia, 'ingenuity,' 'natural cleverness.' Ian's Index to Pliny's N. H. shows that the word is constantly used by Pliny of the instinctive dexterity with which animals avoid danger, secure their food, etc.: dogs viii. 147, dog-fishes ix. 153, she-goats viii. 201, apes viii. 215 , foxes viii. 103, crocodiles xi. 226, birds x. 92, shell-fish ix. III. 14. Sculperet MSS generally, and so I think Av. wrote, comparing Prudentius c. Symm. ii. 779 Exta litant sculptis qui tabida saxis where a Saxon MS in the Bodl. Auct. F. 3. 6 has scluptis, MS Trin. xii. m. pr. scultis. docili pollice is like Claudian's pollice docto Prob. et Olyb. Cons. I77 used of a clever embroideress. 15, 16. A Greek consfruction in Latin comparable with Babrius' constructions in Greek. (Rutherford p. xii.) 'Then you would see how the man, stifled by a deep growl, closed his day of doom in ravening jaws., 15 , oppressum murmure magno MSS oddly but intelligibly. Lachmann's expressum marmore magno is clever, and that is as much as can be said for it. It is very doubtful whether magnum marmor would have been used by $A v_{0}=$ 'a great block of marble.' 16. Condere fata, which Vergil Aen. X. 35 and Lucan vii. I3I use for framing a destiny, here = 'to close a destiny.'

XXV.

This fable is not in Babrius nor in any of the prose versions. But the association of the well and the boy who loses something in it, is also found in the Greek Joe Miller Philogelos 33 Eberhard.
'A boy sat crying at the edge of the water in a well, drawing his mouth wide asunder as he blubbered helplessly. A knave of a thief seeing him with the tears standing in his eyes asked "What was the reason he was in the dumps now"? The child makes up a story how his rope had broken and parted in two pieces, complaining withal that a crock of gold had leapt down the well. Without more ado, the thief's hand tugged at the robe that got in his way; a moment and he is stript and on his way to the well's bottom. Our little fellow, drawing the thief's mantle round his own small throat, plunged, they say, into the brambles, and lay lurking there. The other seeing how his purpose had betrayed him and only brought him face to face with danger, no sooner took his seat on the ground a saddened and discoated man, than with imploring groans to the high gods he gave vent to his sad experience, they say, in these indignant words: "From this time forward, if anyone is fool enough to fancy a jar can swim on flowing water, let him be sure, whoever he may be, that he has no right to complain if he finds his coat is gone."

1. ad undam (for which some MSS give ad oram) implies that the water came sufficiently far up the well for the boy to be described as sitting by its edge. 2. Vana seems a mere expansion of superuacuis, though from XXXXVIII. 7, XL. 8 it might also be explained as 'hypocritical.' The boy is described throughout as sly. Vara, the conj. of Guiet, would more properly be said of the legs than the mouth. But Av. here imitates Juvenal xiii. 137, xvi. 4I Vana superuacui dicunt cbirograpba ligni. rictibus, open-mouthed and demonstrative blubbering is meant. 4. modo, of something which has just happened and is still fresh. Ter. Hec. iii. 5. 8 Aduenis modo? 5, 6. The MSS (except $C$ which has $A_{c}$ ) give Atque in 6, thereby introducing another anacoluthic construction like XVI. I2 respondens canna Seque docet, perhaps like XVII. 13 gemens fractoque loqui uix murmure coepit. In the present instance Atque, which is specially used by Plautus in apodosi $=$ ' on the instant,' e.g. Bacch. ii. 3. 44 Forte ut adsedi in stega Dum circumspecto me atque ego lembum conspicor, Most. v. I. 9 Quom eum conuocaui, atque illi se ex senatu segregant (Dräger ii. 57, Sonnenschein on Most. 1. c.) makes the unlogical character of the construction less marked and glaring. I have therefore retained Atque, but with hesitation, as Fröhner's Hac is not only an easy, but a highly probable, solution of the difficulty, and the weight of $C$ as evidence on a question of readings is very great. discrimina, 'the parting asunder.' So Gratius Cyn. 486 Medio in discrimine luci where the forest parts off, Columella vi. 15. 2 Discrimen ipsum quo diuisa est bouis ungula, Ovid A. A. ii. 302 discrimina lauda, partings in the hair. 6. dilituisse, a variant found in $B$ 'had disappeared,' à申avı $\theta \hat{\eta} \nu a$, , is noticeable. 7. sollicitam, if not as in the translation, must mean the resistance which the mantle made in being pulled off. So I interpret Mart. xii. 60. 9 Turbida sollicito transmittere Caecuba sacco, of a strainer, through which the wine passes slowly and with resistance. improba, either 'greedy;' 'bent on lucre,' here the crock of gold: or 'thievish,' Guiet, nearly= 'furis.' uestem has the respectable support of $B X$, and seems absolutely required by the sense. mentem $A C P$, and Schenkl defends this 'die freche (an das Stehlen gewöhnte) Hand riss den versaglichen, argwöhnischen Sinn mit sich fort.' But traxit can scarcely mean this. The sense is obviously as I have expressed it in my translation. 8. ima petit, a Macrobian expression. S. vii. 8. in Frigus ima petens uitium radicibus inuoluitur. vii. I r. 4 Natura imum petendo penetrat sanguinem. 9. Paruulus, 'the boy.' So paruolae several times in Fronto $=$ 'little girls,' v. 19, 35 ed. Naber.
2. fallaci. Inscriptt. Orcll. 4845,4846 Decipimur uotis. uoto I explain of the thief's engaging to recover the lost crock, which uotum is fallax as betraying him into the danger (I) of drowning, (2) of losing his clothes. To this I think suscepta points: for the word is obviously chosen with a double significance, the actual, of encountering danger (suscepta pericula), the suggested, of taking on oneself a vow (suscipere wota technical in the best Latin e. g. Prop. ii. 9. 25, cf. Mamertin. Paneg. Maximiani vi Et uota suscipere et soluta reddere, Eumen. Paneg. Constantii v uota suscipio). Otherwise fallaci uoto might naturally be explained of the boy's wish to recover the crock: and so Guiet. suscepta pericula, like tantum laboris uigiliarunque suscipere Mamert. Grat. Act. xx, geninatum itineris laborem susceperas Incerti Paneg. Constantin. xxi Bährens. 13. sollers is explained by Cannegieter as 'taught wisdom.' He quotes Avienus Aratea 673 Tums quoque si piceam spectaris surgere noctem, Informem taetris tellurem ut uestiat alis, Litus ama, sollers fuge caerula tegmina noctis, where however Breysig's best MS V gives fuge sollers. But the connexion of sollers with dexterity in thieving (Ovid Met. iv. 776 Id se sollerti furtinn, dum traditur, astu Supposita cepisse manu) makes it possible that Av. has used the word here as little more than a variant for fur, 'the shrewd knave.' uocem rupisse, Vergilian. Aen. ii. 129 Composito rumpit uocen. iii. $24^{6}$ Celaeno Infelix uates, rumpitque banc pectore vocem. xi. 377 Exarsit dictis uiolentia Turni Dat gemitum, rumpitque bas imo pectore uoces. Servius on Aen. iii. ${ }_{2} 4^{6}$ Rumpit uocem cum indignatione loquitur. 15. bene with Perdita, as we might say 'well lost,' meaning that there is nothing surprising or unreasonable in the loss. It is hardly likely that bene can here $=$ 'cheaply' as in bene emere, though the sense would well suit, as the descent into the well might have cost the man his life.

XXVI.

This fable is not found in our Babrius, but it exists in a slightly altered form in several prose versions. The lion in these has become a wolf.

Fab. Aesop. Halm 270.

The valuable Latin Glossary 4626 in Sir Thomas Phillipps' library at Cheltenham contains an extract from Avianus' version of this fable. Citisus est berba de qua Auianus florentem citisum carpe.
2. Comminus, ' near,' 'close at hand,' as in Mamert. Genethl. Maxim. xii Ad intuendum comminus quantum potuit accessit. This use which Hand Tursellin. ii. p. 97 dates from the Augustan era, but which Servius more generally ascribes to the ueteres on Geor. i. Io 4 Veteres enim non in tempore sed in loco comminus ponebant, a passage which seems to justify the retention of the word in Catull. lxiv. 109.
3. From Vergil Aen. i. 32 I Ac prior, beus, inquit, iuuenes ('Ha! my men,' Mackail) monstrate, where Servius notes Heus nunc aduerbium uocantis est. prior, 'first,' before he was accosted by the she-goat. ardua with praeruptis saxis, 'the ground steep with precipitous crags.'
4. hirsutis, 'the prickly slopes,' mainly in reference to the briars and hairy shrubs with which they bristle. Propertius has birsuti rubi (iv. 4. 28), Vergil birsuti uepres, birsutae frondes (G. iii. 444, 231), Calpurnius birsuta genista (i. 5). 5. cytisi. Keightley (Flora Vergiliana pp. $38 \mathrm{I}, 2$ ) states that this is the arborescent lucerne, a view first put forward by a Candian physician, Vicentini, and now generally followed. It has a yellow flower of which bees are fond, and cows as well as goats eat its leaves with avidity. In the Aiyes of Eupolis a chorus of she-goats enumerating the various shrubs on which they feed mention cytisus, a kind that the goats' fondness for cytisus was proverbial. Cf. Hehn Kulturpflanzen p. 299 ed. 1870.6 . glaucas salices from Verg. G. iv. 182. Vergil calls the leaves of the willow pale-green, G. ii. 13 glauca canentia fronde salicta. thyma grata, from Horace C. iv. 2. 29. 7. gemens, 'with a groan'; a rather strong word for the occasion. Av. probably implies the goat's consciousness of perpetual danger from the lion, which is too strong to be put out of mind by flattering words. This is why ' heavily she answers with a groan.' Shakespere Sonnet 50. 8. insimulare MSS, perhaps rightly in the sense of 'pretend.' In Plaut. Amph. iii. 2. 21 Nisi etiam boc falso dici insimulaturus es, Verr. ii. 2. 24, 59 Aduersarii $120 n$ audebant contra dicere : exitus nullus reperiebatur. Insimulant boninem fraudandi causa discessisse: postulant ut bona possidere iubeat, the word has been thought to have this meaning; and so certainly in Apul. M. vii. II Insimulatione promendi quae poscebat usus, ad puellam commeabat assidue. See Hildebrand 1.c. Cf. the S. Gallen Glossary edited by Minton Warren insimulat accusat fing it. The construction however (with which cf. arguitur uinosus Hor. Epp. i. 29. 6 Wilkins, sperate deos memores Aen. i. 543) is peculiar, insim. securant me for ins. secur. me esse: and it is better either (I) to read insinuare whether as active 'take to your bosom,' or as neuter, in which sense both insinuare and insinuari are constructed by Lucretius with an accus. dependent on the in (Munro on Lucr. i. II6, cf. iv. ro30) 'steal over my security,' or (2) as the Paraphrast read, and as Wopkens suggested, instimulare, Ov. Fast. vi. 508. This I have adopted as perhaps the least objectionable view, and as accepted by Lachmann, Fröhner, and Bährens. In Plaut. Pers. i. 3. 48 most of Ritschl's MSS give instimulas for insimulas: conversely in Orientius Common. i. 220 Delrio's MS gives instimulare for insimulare. 9. 'Though the dangers you urge are true, and though you suppress the greater dangers (of following your advice), after all you cannot make me believe what you say.' Vera makes a better antithesis to maiora if taken with pericula. But it is of course possible that Av. meant merely 'though what you urge is true.' tollas MSS. 'Withdraw' or 'keep out of view' seems to be the idea. Quintilian v. 10. $65^{\text {'rut sit ciuis, aut natus sit oportet, aut factus': utrumque }}$ tollendum est, 'nec natus nec factus est' uses tollere = refellere, 'to deny': but this the lion in our fable did not do, except by implication. 10. The position of Tu at the beginning of the clause, as well as of the line, makes the statement more marked and positive: 'be sure you cannot get your words believed.' non facis esse fidem $=$ non facis credi. Av. is fond of the combination facis, facit, esse, so XXXIX. 16 alios quod facis esse malos, XXXVI. 14 Expertem nostri quae facit esse iugi, XXIII. 2 fecerat esse deum, no doubt determined by its metrical convenience. Thielmann (Archiv für Latein. Lexicog. iii. p. 188) traces this construction in the Early Latin versions of the Bible and in Tertullian, Cyprian, etc. Infin. after facere is especially frequent in the Christian poets from Prudentius to Venantius Fortunatus. The former has two instances, Perist. xiii. 45, c. Symm. ii. 220; the latter more than sixty. The tendency was an increasing one from the first century onwards. 11. 'Though your words are honest and have a sound drift.' constet sententia is like constat mens, 'the mind is sane,' Cels. iii. 19. I; constat lingua, 'the tongue does not falter,' Sen. Epist. 83. fin. [For constet $C$ and virtually $A$ give constat, and both quamuis and licet are sometimes followed by indic. in the Digest (Roby Introd. to Digest p. ccxvi)]. 12. Suspectam. Quintil. v. 14.35 Quoque quid est natura magis asperum, boc pluribus condiendum est uoluptatibus : et minus suspecta argumentatio dissimulatione, et multum, ad fidem adiuuat audientis uoluptas. rabidus, 'hungry' or 'famished.' Aen. vi. 421 Ille fame rabida tria guttura pandens. ix. 63 collecta fatigat edendi Ex longo rabies (Canneg.). consiliator, a word used by Phacdrus ii. 7 . 6 Si uero accessit consiliator maleficus (Canneg.) as well as Ausonius Grat. Act. x Habes ergo consiliatorem et non metuis proditorem, which looks as if it might be a reference to our fable. These nouns in -tor -ator are much affected by writers of this period. Symm. Epist. i. 90 Fit plerumque ut leuia rerum portator festiuus exornet, a sentence which in form is exactly like Av.'s line. ii. I Hic ille est Paralius cui accusator pater quantum discriminis mouit, tantum laudis parauit. habes, though only found in one MS $\left(b^{3}\right)$ is approved by Wopkens and adds immensely to the point. As Wopkens points out, suspectam babes sententiam $=$ 'sententiac fidem ab aliis non impetras.'

'This fable is not in our Babrius, nor in any of Halm's versions. It exists however in the short collection of eighteen fables ascribed to Dositheus (ed. Böcking, 1834).

If Aelian may be trusted, the ingenuity here ascribed to the crow, properly belongs to the Libyan species of the bird. It seems a fair inference that this is one of the $\Lambda$ ı $\beta$ gaturoì $\lambda$ óyot.

Dosithei Fab. vily.

1. urnam, 'a jar' = viopiav. 2. minimam, 'a very small amount of water.' fundo, 'in bodome' Treves MS, 'the water did not rise above the bottom of the jar.' continuisset is probably a mere attraction into the tense of aspexerat, cf. Drizer i. agr sqq., though the pluperf. might have its proper meaning 'which the crow had tound on examining to hold only a very little water.' The subjunctive carries on the definition of the jar as observed by the bird. 3. enisa $C$ and so I think Av. wrote. Cannegieter quotes Serv. on Aen. i. I 44 Adnixus antiquum est, ut 'conixus,' quibus hodie non utimur; dicimus enims 'adnisus' et 'conisus.' Charisius p. 374 Keil nitor niteris, perfecto nisus sum: sed ueteres inmutantes nixus declinant, ut Vergilius (then four quotations from Verg. of conixus adnixus obnixus adnixus) melius autem dicimus nisus et nisa a nitendo, enixa enim appellatio est et ad partum refertur, cum dicimus geminos enixa est, ut apud Vergilium Triginta capitum fetus enixa: ut sit enisa uiribus conata, enixa in genua. effundere, 'to spill.' None of my MSS support the spelling ecfundere, which Fröhner has ventured to introduce on the very doubtful evidence of Cabeljau. 5. uiam uirtus is a combination found in Claudian B. Gild. 318 Noui consilium, noui Stilichonis in omnes Aequalem casus animum: fenctrahit barchas: Inuenict wirtute wiam. Here uiam answers to $\mu \in \theta$ ©ó $\omega$ of Dositheus' fable, 'system ' or 'plan,' ' way of effecting:' just as uirtus expresses àvópót $\eta \tau a$, 'resolution,' 'stout effort.' Canneg. compares Phaedr. i. 13. 13 l'irtute semper pracualet safientia. admouet, a soldiers' word, used by Vegetius and the Panegyrici of moving up ( $\pi$ poorá $\gamma \epsilon \iota \nu$ ) military engines, ladders, towers, rams, etc. Veg. iv. 2 adm. scalas uel machinas, iv. 13 admouentur testudines arietes falces uineae plutei musculi turres, cf. iv. 2I. Non. 186 Sapientia gubernator nauens torquet, non ualentia. 10. cornix for uolucris of MSS restores metre so easily and naturally that I have not scrupled to introduce it. explicuisset is the correlative of coeptum, 'as by it the crow had despatched the task it had undertaken,' i.e. had got at the water at last by the mechanical and dilatory process of dropping stones into the jar. So Pomponius in the Digest xxvii. 7. I Quamuis beres tutoris tutor non est, tamen ea quae per defunctum incboata sunt per beredem, si legitimae aetatis et masculus sit, explicari debent. Apulcius M. x. 6 has sepulturam explicare, Florus i. 17 bellum periculosissimum exp. Frontin. de Aquaed. 121 Ideoque baee opera sollicita festinatione explicanda sunt. Sulpicius Severus Chron. i. 40 Coeptum templi opus uigesimo anno explicuit. The word always gives the idea of something to be evolved or got through with difficulty.

XXVIII.

I have been unable to find this fable either in Babrius or any prose version.

1. Vincla. Columella ii. 6 gives directions for breaking in young bullocks (domitura). The horns were to be fastened with ropes of hemp; headstalls wound round with wool to prevent wounding the forehead to be placed beneath the horns. When taken to the stall they were to be tied to stakes (stipites) or to the manger (praesepe). recusanti, 'shirking.' So Val, Fl. vii. 589 Ille (the fire-breathing bull) uirum atque ipsam tunc te, Medea, recusans. Col. ii. 2. 26 Vltima sint opus recusantibus remedia flague. 2. Aspera, 'fierce',' 'ili-tempered.' Pallad. iv. 12 Si nimia fuerit asperitus, uno die ac nocte inter uincula mitigentur atque itunia; ib). Asperum bouem mansueto et ualido boui coniungas. In Digest. ix. I it is used of a dog, si canis asperitate sua euaserit. mordaci, 'griping' or 'pinching.' 3. obliqua might be explained of the zig-zag or notched indentations of the falx, if we suppose the countryman to have used such an implement as is figured by Rich Companion p. 273 No. 3, in which such a notched blade (denticulata), is represented. It is more likely that obliqua refers to the slanting position in which the knife was held by the countryman, perhaps to cut the horns away with more effect, or to make the task easier. 4. insanum, 'ferocious,' 1 X .24 . defremuisse $=$ desacuiisse of Columella vi. 2. 4. Defremere is found in the younger Pliny ix. 13. 4 of anger, and several times in Apollinaris Sidonius. (Unrein p. 39.) 5. immenso. Av. like Merobaudes Paneg. Actii 73 Pace sub inmensa, uses the word immense in a sense considerably short of our word, of large bullocks XVIII. i, of a full-grown lion XII. i. Here then it need mean no more than 'ponderous,' such as would keep in check the outbreaks of temper in an untamed steer. Yet it is noticeable that one of the earliest MSS $P$ has inmensae, possibly a relic of a variant immensam, which would well suit the thick neck which often is found in vicious beasts. aratro. Columella directs (vi.2.7) that on the seventh day of the domitura, a yoke with a bough attached to it to serve as a pole (temo) was to be put on unbroken steers, and after this they are, as the next step, to draw an empty wasen: thus at last to be yoked to the plough. 6. cornu promptior atque pede, 'over-ready to butt or kick.' Col. vi. 2.8 Curandum the in domitura bos calce aut cornu quemquam contingat, nam nisi baec caueantur, numquam eiusmodi uitia quamuis subacto eximi poterunt. promptior, a favorite word in Symmachus' Letters. 7. uerbera in good Latin is so regularly used of lashes from a whip that Av. might seem to mean that the pole of the plough-share was meant to prevent any necessity of whipping the animal, c.g. if it turned fractious and lay dows, ef. Pallad. ir. 12. & Si post domitaram de cun: hit in sulco, nom afficiortur igne, uel uerbere. Colum. vi. 2. 10 Seu conatur decumbere . . . ad patientiam latoris purucissimis uerberibus producitur. Stat. Theb). v. 231 I't fora quae placido rabiem desueta magistro Tardius arma moutet, stimulisque et uerbere crebro In mores negat ire suos. But the two vv, can hardly be separated from each other, and as in 8 Av . speaks of the steer using his hoof, he probably meant in 7 that he tried to use his horns, 'uerbera, capitis et pedum ' Guiet. Elsewhere he applies the word to the strokes of a dog's or tiger's tail V'll. 5, XVIJ. 4. S. sacua, 'ankry'. 9. irato, as Ovid speaks of irati ocelli, irata manus Am. ii. 8. 15, iii. 6. 76. Here the epithet suggests the convulsive plungings of the animal to get rid of the neck-straps by which the plough is attached. detractans the best MSS, not detrectans, and so Jeep writes the word in Claud.

Rapt. Pros. i. 156: retractare is, I believe, invariable. 10. Inmeritam, the unoffending ground, which the bullock kicks in impotent rage. So Catullus Irascere iterum meis iambis Inmerentibus, and Propertius more than once, ii. 4. 3 Et saepe inmeritos corrumpas dentibus ungues, iv. 5 . 16. Hor, S. ii, 3. 8 Inmeritusque laborat Iratis natus paries dis atque poetis. uacuo is found in $B X$ and the two Peterhouse MSS as well as in the Treves MS (Sacc. x) and Bährens' Ashburnamensis (Saec. xi-xii). To $B$ I incline to give great weight, perhaps the more so that the dot added beneath the o shows uacuo to have been the $m$. pr. Calx was used masc. by Lucilius (Charis. 93.2 Keil), Plautus and Varro (Non. 199), Gratius (Cyn. 278), and in the Excerpta Charisii 55 I K. is included among nouns which are fem. in Greek, masc. in Latin. The seeming preponderance of antiquity in favour of uacua, which is found in all Fröhner's Paris MSS, is rather diminished by the testimony of the Trevirensis; but in a case of this kind the abnormal gender, even though supported by evidence on the whole inferior, seems likely to be right as abnormal. The meaning seems to be 'ineffectual.' Wopkens cites Claud, in Rufin. i. 16 Vacuo quae currere semina motu Adfirmat. Apul. M. ix. 14 Confictis obseruationibus uacuis (unreal). fatigat, 'worries.' 11. euersam is glossed in the Treves MS by the word emotam. 12. A verse not yet satisfactorily emended. sequentis, to guide the plough. agit. This use of the hind feet to kick up earth or stones in the face of a pursuer is ascribed by Amm. Marcellinus xxiii. 4. 7 to onagri. His words well illustrate Av. Ita eminus lapides post terga calcitrando emittunt, ut perforent pectora sequentium aut perfractis ossibus capita ipsa displodant. 14. Discutiens, 'shaking' about him to get rid of the dust. Not a common use. imo pectore uictus, he felt he was utterly beaten. Ovid Trist. i. 4. 11, 12 Nauita confessus gelido pallore timorem Iam sequitur uictus, non regit arte, ratem. 15, 16. 'Sure enough I needed to learn what a vicious temper can be: how it can have a metbod in its mischief.' 15. derat, the imperf. of reflection. The mind goes back to its past experiences, and returns with the conclusion which results from comparing them with the present. This use of the imperf. is common in Plato. iniquae, 'vicious' or 'intractable.' Hor. S. i. 9. 20 iniquae mentis asellus. 16. Qua, 'how.' Verg. Aen. i. 676 Qua facere id possis nostram nunc accipe mentem, where Servius notes Qua id est quomodo. cum ratione, 'on system,' 'methodically.' Veget. i. I5 l't dextra (of the archer) cum ratione ducatur, where it seems to mean, with the proper method. A different, but I think less correct, interpretation is suggested by Colum. vi. 2. II Eum (an ox that lies down instead of drawing the plough) non sneuitia, sed ratione (by methodical treatment) censeo emendandum. Then cum ratione will be 'under methodical treatment' which was meant to cure vice, and ends with producing it. In Orientius i. 603,4 Hinc cohbibet totum pacis concordia mundum, Quae brutis etiam cum ratione datur the meaning is doubtful. Guiet notes: 'ita libere recusans iugum i.e. hominum more, non brutorum,' which seems to be virtually my first suggestion.

There is a passage in Symmachus' Letters which might seem to allude to vv. 21, 22 in a different application, Epp. i. 101 Qui fieri potest ut os unum contrariis adfectionibus induamus?

1. congestis. Av. seems to have in his mind Vergil's description of a Siberian winter G. iii. 353 sqq., especially 354,5 Sed iacet aggeribus niueis deformis et alto Terra gelu late septemque adsurgit in ulnas. See again on 5. 2. Cunctaque well expresses the universal veil of whiteness that lay on the frozen fields. Vinctaque, though conjectured by Heinsius and said to be found in some MSS (it is not in any of mine), introduces a tautology that Av. would have avoided. durato stringeret arua gelu. Orientins Common. ii. 279 Illos constringet . . . dura gehu glacies. 3. Haesit, ' was stopt or arrested,' 'brought up suddenly in his course.' Cic. Mil. xxi. 56 In quos incensos ira uitamque domini desperantes cum incidisset, baes it in iis poenis quas ab eo serui fideles pro domini uita expetiuerunt. Verg. Aen. xi. 289 Hectoris Aeneaeque manu uictoria Graium Haesit. nimborum mole may have been suggested, as Cannegieter thought, by Vergil's torpent mole noua G. iii. 370 , said of stags numbed by an unusual weight of snow. But nimborum (for which $B$ and the second Peterhouse MS absurdly substitute membrorum) can only apply to snow so far as it is still unfallen and while descending with rain or in the form of sleet. This however is not the meaning; Av. obviously refers to the heavy and thick mists which often supervene after severe frost, and in which it is easy to be lost. 4. Perdita, 'obscured,' ' lost to sight.' Val. Fl. i. 466 Cumque aethera Iuppiter umbra Perdiderit, solus transibit nubila Lynceus. (Cannegieter.) 6. continuisse, 'to have given shelter to.' There is no idea of confining indoors, as Cannegieter supposed, though in Geor. i. 259, Amphit. ii. 2. 58 the rain (imber) and the weather (tempestas) are said to detain the farmer and the intending traveller (continere). 7. 'Construe Quem ruris alumnus aspiciens, simul (dum nempe aspicit) miratur' Wopkens. Cf. Aen. x. 856 Simul boc dicens attollit in aegrum se femur, where Conington quotes Liv. xxii. 3 Haec simul increpans cum ocius signa conuelli iuberet,

2. The reading of this v . is very doubtful. The MSS generally give Vimque bomini tantam protinus esse pauet, which cannot be right, as (i) Vim tantam is a ludicrous exaggeration; (2) protinus, unlike the instances compared by Schenkl from the other fables, is pointless and flat. Believing with Lachmann and Fröhner that the v. is corrupt, I think it possible that for this should be read frontis in esse: the Satyr is frightened at the man's unblushing use of his mouth for two purposes so wholly different, warming and cooling. The effrontery lies in the contradiction of the two uses; the alarm which follows it, springs from the dangerous character naturally attributable to such perverse inconsistency. This use of frons is common: Pers. v. $103-104$ Nauem si poscat sibi peronatus arator Luciferi rudis, exclamet Melicerta perisse Frontem de rebus. Juv. xiii. 242 Eiectum semel attrita de fronte ruborem. Mart. xi. 27.7 At cum perfricuit frontem posuitque ruborem. Sen. N. Q. iv Praef. 9 Quo magis frontem suam perfricuit. A passage from Symmachus' Letters (i.90) well illustrates my conj. Vereor protelare testimonium meum, ne magis laudi eius obsecutus iudicer quam pudori: nam quorum mens bonesta est, corum inbecilla frons est. It is however true, as Wilkins has observed on Hor. Epist. i. 9. 11, that in this sense of assurance frons is ordinarily combined with some adjective like inuerecunda proterua etc. pauet. Anecd. Fulgentianum ed. Reyfferscheid p. 7 Flamma etiam pluere didicit atque in suis incendiis guttas babere se repentinas expauit. 9. uitae in usum, like Vergil's usum in castrorum, usums agrestem G. iii. 313,163 . 10. calido ore, 'with the hot breath of his mouth.' soluerat, 'had thawed.' Hor. C. i. 4. I Soluitur acris biemps. The transference from snow and winter to the frozen limbs is so natural as to make any change like Lachmann's fouerat unnecessary. 12. Hospitis sedulitate, 'attentions of his host.' Canneg. crowds his columns with illustrations of this well-known use. I have found a typical instance which is better than any of his. Ovid F. vi. 529-534 Hospita Carmentis fidos intrasse penates Diceris et longam deposuisse famem. Liba sua properata manu Tegeaea sacerdos Traditur et subito cocta dedisse foco. Nunc quoque liba iuuant festis Matralibus illam. Rustica sedulitas gratior arte fuit. 13. agrestem uitam, 'how they lived in the country.' 14. referens, 'bringing from bis stores,' i.e. from the place where they were stowed away, or possibly 'one after the other,' optima quaeque. But in the time of Av. referre had lost much of its original distinction of meaning, as may be seen in a passage of the Panegyrici, Gratiarum Actio Constantin. x Tu fructus meritorum tuorum station nos metere et in conditis referre iussisti. dabat, of successive offers: whereas the optulit refers to the single offer of the goblet. 18. algenti, the natural opposite of calidus. Plin. H. N. xx. 117 Sucus (olusatri) algentis calefacit potus. rursus, 'now again,' in reference to his blowing on his hands before to suarm them. reflat, Schenkl's conj. for suffat of MSS satisfies all requirements. Lucretius iv. 938 Cum ducitur atque reflatur (aer) 'as it is inhaled or exhaled.' Munro. Apul. M. ix. 25 Hominem crebros anbelitus aegre reflantem. This sense 'breathes out, exhales' would suffice; but it is possible that Av. has a more direct antithesis in view, viz. to Adflatas calido soluerat ore manus; as there the mouth breathes on the hands to thaw them, so here it breathes a counter breath on the goblet to cool it: reflat would then be 'blows the other way.' 19. monstro, 'prodigy.' It was strange to the Satyr to see the mouth used for either purpose, warming or cooling. This is the natural interpretation: but it is possible Av. meant not a double, but a tavo-sided prodigy, i.e. one which was equally surprising from either point of view; if the breath could warm, how could it cool? if it cooled, how could it warm? 21. 'Nolo with ut has no existence, though probibere and cobibere with ut are found.' Dräger ii. p. 249. The present instance is therefore a rare exception. Of uolo ut Dräger quotes eight instances from Plautus, several from Cicero. successerit, from Verg. Aen. iv. io Quis nouus bic nostris successit sedibus bospes? and Ecl. v. 6 Siue antro potius succedimus, 19 successimus antro. 22. duō. Krenkel (De Aurel. Prudentii Clementis Re Metrica 1884) quotes a similar duö before fluxerunt from Prud. Hamart. 122, Lucian Müller de R. M. p. 335 duō cogunt in a hexameter from Perist. xi. 89, to which add duö uariarum Hamart. I3.

XXX.

This also is not in our Babrius, nor in any prose version. The joke, however, with which it ends, the pig's want of heart, i.e. intelligence, a Roman not a Greck play of words (see on $1_{4}$ ), is found in the ninety-fitth fable of the Babrian Collection.

The last two verses, rejected no doubt rightly by $R$ utherford, are retained here, as they correspond closely with Avianus' closing distich:

> Nam cur membrorum demens in damna redisset, Atque uno totiens possit ab hoste capi?

Similarly in the Aesopic fable of the Dog and the Cook (Halm 232), when the dog has run off with a heart, the cook tells him: 'You have given me heart, not taken my heart away: for henceforward I shall be taught wisdom and be on my guard against you.' This joke about the pig's want of heart may be compared with Cleanthes' dictum that, as pigs were only good for eating, their soul ( $\psi v \chi \dot{\eta}$ anima Cic. de Nat. Deor. ii. 64, 164) was given them to keep the flesh from putrifying. See the learned note of Jos. Mayor on the passage of Cic.

Hartung (Thesaur. Critic. ii. 8. 5 in Gruter's Lampas ii. p. 726) cites a passage from Eustathius on Odys. xviii. 29 which states that there was an alleged law in Cyprus that a pig found eating the crop of any one not its

The gloss in one of my Rodl. MSS $R$, excepti seems substantially right. The field was 'reserved ' perhaps under a special stipulation (exceptic) which forbade it to be used for any ordinary purpose, e.g. a field used for burial (see van Goens de Cepotaphiis) ; or, in a more general sense, set apart and reserved for crops of a particular and valuable kind, which would make the invasion of them by the pig a more heinous offence (crimine). It is however true that the participle agreeing with campi would more naturally express the nature of the offence; then exsculpti, 'grubbed up,' which was conjectured by Lachmann, and has since been found in the Gale MS, would seem better than excerpti of Guiet and Fröhner, though this has the support of Wopkens, who notes p. 41 'Proprie quidem non campi excerpebantur, sed illa quae de campis proueniebant, atque inde a suc auferebantur.' crimine campi, 'offence of grubbing up a field.' Juv. vi. 493 flexi crimen facinusque capilli, 'the offence and crime of spoiling a ringlet.' 6. indultae, 'spared.' Sil. xiv. 672 Indulgens templa uetustis Incolere atque babitare deis. Indulgere followed by an accus. of the thing conceded is common in the Digest, e.g. xlii. 6. I § I 4 Practoris erit uel praesidis notio, nullius alterius, hoc est eius qui separationem indulturus est. The passive participle which is found in some MSS of Nux 39 hardly belongs to classical Latin. perfidus, 'by his treachery.' auris onus, the one ear he was still allowed to bear. 7. praedictne of MSS is not impossible, as it might well mean 'the before,' i.e. 'first-mentioned ' crop, viz. that in v. r, and the pig-lseaded violation a second time of a field which had cost him the first of his two lost ears, would be an aggravation of a signal kind. In the natural sense of 'the field aforesaid,' i.c. in 5, the word is a little flat, though common enough in writers of an even early period. Colum. Praef. lib. i. I Saepenumero ciuitatis nostrae principes audio culpantes modo agrorum infecunditatem, modo caeli per multa iam tempora noxiam frugibus intemperiem : quosdam etiam. praedictas querimonias uelut ratione certa mitigantes. vi. 5. \& Facto foramini praedicta radicula inseritur. vi. 7. \& Nec minus cacumina praedictarum arborum obiciunt, 'the aforesaid trees,' 18 quod si praedictum uitium inboeserit sc. coriago (skin-disease), 19 post fomenta praedicta. (Quintil. viii. 3. 83 Vicina praedictae sed amplior uirtus est and so often, see Spalding's Index. Auson. Parent. v. 2 praedicto Arborio mentioned in Parent. iv; Tetrast. Caesarum i. I Nunc et praedictos et regni sorte sequentes, 'those I have spoken of already and those who succeeded them.' Ennod. Epist. ix. a Praedictum iuntenem, 'the aforesaid young man.' Exactly similar is the use of $\pi \rho \circ є \iota \rho \eta \mu \in \in$ vos in Polybius. Thus in two consecutive sections of the same chapter Xv. 3I. 9, 10 $\tau \dot{\nu}$ єíкóva той $\pi \rho \circ є \iota \rho \eta \mu$ ย́vov = the image of the said Agathocles, $\lambda a \beta \grave{\omega} \nu$ т ̀̀s $\pi \rho о є \iota \rho \eta-$ $\mu$ évas évròás, 'the commands I mentioned above': the former referring to what had immediately preceded, the latter to what had been mentioned some sections above. If Av. meant this, he was guilty of a prosaism not usual in the fables; if the other, of a reprehensible ambiguity. Hence Lachmann may have been right in his conj. praedator; for praeda was, at least in its Greck form, technically used of the damage done by an animal in grubbing up or in other ways injuring a piece of ground: seen on 2. horrens is glossed in the Treves MS truncatum. Rightly. 8. Poena sed indignume the best MSS, Poena quod indignum two Bodleian and the second Peterhouse. If indignum was written by Av. it can only mean that the loss of an ear which the pig had twice successively suffered made the third offence an outrage: which outrage was instantly followed by the death of the guilty animal (Tune 9). In this case quod is neater than sed, which indeed introduces an abruptness alien to our author's style. Hence there is high probability in Lachmann's conj. Poena sed insignem ${ }^{1}$, ' but the double repetition of the punishment (cutting off both ears) makes him a marked pig,' and therefore easily detected. Cf. Lucil. xxvii. ap. Non. 33 I Cocus non curat cauda insignem esse illam (billam) dum pinguis siet. congeminata, XXII.8. 9. superbis, 'sumptuous dinner.' Pork in various forms would hardly now figure at a grand dinner; since Av.'s time Jewish scruples have been reinforced by Mahommedan; European tastes have succumbed to Oriental. 10. epulas, 'dishes' or 'entrees.' Cic. Tusc. Disp. v. 2 I. 62 Aderant unguenta, coronae, incendebantur odores, mensae conquisitissimis epulis exstruebantur. 11. consumpti, 'eaten up,' one dish after another. Verg. Aen. vii. 125 Accisis cogat dapibus consumere mensas. 12. Impatiens, 'ravenous.' His hunger could not brook delay. rapuisse, 'to have appropriated.' 14. stultum non habuisse, 'the pig was a fool and had no such thing.' Cic. Tusc. 1. oberrans, 'as he went his rounds,' 'roamed to and fro.' Vegetius twice uses the word of a spy wandering about an enemy's camp unobserved (iii. 26), of an enemy wandering about carelessly in quest of plunder (iii. 10). 2. The use of ab here may be compared with XX. 4 Atque

[^8]auido fixum uulnus ab ore tulit. In both $a b$ accentuates and brings into relief the source through which the wound comes. But in the present v. $a b$ is used where ordinary Latin would use a simple able, as very often in Ovid, e.g. M. viii. 513 Inuitis correptus ab ignibus arsit. A. A. i. 763 Hi iaculo pisces, illi capiuntur ab bamis. Pont. iv. 7.9 Qui semel est laesus fallaci piscis ab bamo. (From Dräger i. p. 508, cf. my note on Ibis 145.) 3. conficere uulnera is very rare and somewhat doubtful in meaning. Dr. K. E. Georges thinks it is merely a stronger facere; Ovid Quintilian Martial use uulnus facere $=$ to wound, and so confecit uulnera might here be simply 'had well wounded him.' On the other hand, the far commoner use of conficere for despatching or effecting anything thoroughly, makes it possible that Av. meant 'to make an end of wounding.' And this agrees better with the natural sequel of completing so super-murine a task, viz. the safe retirement of the mouse to his hole, which follows in $4 \mathcal{T}_{\text {utus }}$ in amfractus conditur. 4. anfractus most MSS, amfractis my Bodl. X and virtually the second Peterhouse, in which the first hand wrote ampbaractis. The word is ordinarily masc., sometimes neuter ; Nonius 192 quotes anfracta from Accius and the Parmeno of Varro (cauata auriums anfracta). Cf. Varro de L. L. vii. 15 M. Quod est Terrarum anfracta reuisam; anfractum est flexum, ab origine duplici dictum, ab ambitu et frangendo; ab eo leges iubent in directo pedum viii esse, in anfracto xvi, id est in flexu. Professor Key considers anfractus to be 'a compression of amberactus, so that the second part of the word comes from ago. This agrees with the use of it for the sun's revolution in his orbit in Cic. de Rep. vi. i2. 12 , and in the religious ceremony of the ambarualia, in annuis amfractibus Leg. ii. 8. 19.' Language p. 385. Here the word is applied to the winding hole in which the mouse lived. inde, 'thereupon.' 5. uasta ceruice minetur, cf. XXVIII. 5. minatur is given by some MSS, and so certat XV.9. 'Licet is generally used with the subjunctive in law Latin as well as in other: but occasionally we have the indicative.' Roby, Justinian, p. 78. 6. 'For all his rage sees nowhere the foe he must attack.' esse most MSS, which is slightly accentuated 'exists,' not merely ' is.' $X$ and my Brit. Mus. $b^{2}$ (a good one) give an interesting and lively v.l. ille which well expresses the complete and decided defeat of the enraged ox, spite of all his attempts, ' not for an instant can he see.' 7. iusto of MSS is weak, even if interpreted 'fitting,' 'suitable,' as in Aegritudo Perdicae 68 ed. Bährens $O$ socii uestro iustum si corde uidetur. Withof saw this, but his conj, mus boc is improbable. I have written lusor which would explain sermone. Amphit. ii. 2. 62 Quid enim censes? te ut deludam contra lusorem meum? fatigans is interpreted by Savaron on Sidon. Ep. v. 17 in the sense of 'joking,' 'bantering,' which is common in Sidonius' Letters and quoted by Savaron from Sulpicius Severus, Acron the commentator on Horace, Victor in his Life of Carus, Cassianus, the author of the treatise de Vita Contemplatioa, ascribed to Prosper, and the Scholiast on Juv. ix. Sid. i. 8 Facete et fatigationum salibus admixtis. iii. $x_{3}$ Si fatiget, in contumelias, si fatigetur in furias (fertur), where the Bodleian Glosses edited by me in Anecd. Oxoniens. i. 5, p. 40 note Sifatiget s. alios conuicia dicendo, sifatigetur ab aliis .s. quasi diceret, si alii derideant eum. Sid. iv. io Dicere solebas quamquam fatigans quod meam quasi facundiam uererere; and hence the substantive futigatio, "banter;' aldj. futicutorius, 'bantering.' There can be little doubt that this was Av.'s meaning; for what force could there be in representing the mouse, after his successful attack on the bull, going on to evorry him with a lengthy admonition on the text Pride has a fall? The Treves MS however glosses fatigans by the word prouocans. 8. Almost a repetition of X. 10 Distulit ammota calliditate iocum, where see note. 9. tribuerunt. Very similarly Fab. Perottin. ii. 3 Nam cuncta nobis (natura) attribuisset commoda

Quaccumque indulgens Fortuna animali dedit. 10. effectum, 'efficiency,' 'potency.' The combination Viribus effectum is Propertian. El. iii. 9. 27 Et tibi ad effectum uires det Caesar, which A. Palmer, following Beroaldus, wrongly alters to affectum. constituere, 'assigned,' MSS. Lachmann's conj. contribuere, 'have given with the limbs' is very seductive: cf. Mamertin. Paneg. Maximiani xi Pulcherrimis rebus tu tribuis effectum. 11. breuibus, 'little' as in XIV. 9, XXXIV. 6. rostris, the admirable conj. of Fröhner removes all difficulties. The MSS have monstris which is meaningless. fiducia as in XXIV. II subjectively of the mouse, 'what self-reliance pigmy snouts possess.' 12. Et faciat MSS, to which Guiet supplied ut from the relative in rI 'et disce ut paruula turba faciat quidquid cupit.' Wopkens also retained faciat, making the subject paruula turba referred backwards. But the construction Wopkens quotes from Tusc. Disp. iv. 4. 7 Defendat quod quisque sentit, cf. Cantet amat qued quisque Nemes. Ecl. iv, is peculiar to quisque or quis, and therefore not parallel. See Madvig on Fin. iii. 20. 67. I prefer to follow the first Peterhouse, the $m$. secunda of $B$, and the Paraphrast in reading facias. quicquid paruula turba cupit, 'act on the suggestion of the mouse-population.' Av. here follows in the track of Phaedrus iv. 6. 13 minuta plebes, in the Epilogue to the Fable of the Mice and the Weasels. But possibly Av. wrote sapit.

1. gurgite, 'pool.' 3. depositis seems to be used here not in the classical sense of giving up (Juv. i. I33, where Mayor cites Sen. Suas. v. I Quae male expertus est uota deponit) but of placing or depositing for security, as in deponere aurum, d. pecuniam, etc. Cf. Horace's quidquid babes age Depone tutis auribus, a sense to which the common use of depositum as a legal term would naturally lead the way. The reading of some MSS dispositis is preferred by Cannegieter, and would bear a good sense, as the prayers are offered to the gods (numina) generally, and might thus be said to be distributed. But in the age of Avianus disponere had lost much of its original meaning, as the recurring use of disposita $=$ 'arrangements' in Symmachus' Letters shows: and though in 3 he uses the plural numina, he specifies the single god Hercules in 6, as indeed Babrius had done even тробєки́vєь тє катiцд. Hence I follow the earlier MSS in retaining depositis which is to be constructed with Frustra, 'feeling sure that the vows he did but lodge in vain would move the gods to help his fortunes, despite his own inactivity., 4. Hercules was not only born at Tiryns (Serv. on Aen. vii. 662 Tiryntbius a Tirynthi ciuitate Argis uicina in qua nutritus est) where Electryon, the father of his mother Alcmena, had reigned, but, after his father Amphitryon's expulsion from thence by Sthenelus (Apollod. ii. 4. 6), being ordered by the Delphian oracle, which he had consulted after his frenzied murder of his children, to divell in Tiryns, returned there, and from it started to perform the XII atbla imposed by Eurystheus. Thus Hesiod (Theog. 291) speaks of his driving the oxen of Geryon into sacred Tiryns, and Pindar (Isthm. v. (vi.) 40) states that he went $\sigma \dot{v} \nu$ Tıpuv ${ }^{\text {Oourat }}$ to Troy. The fact that already in the Telephus of Euripides fr. 697 Nauck he is styled $\tau \omega$ © TıpvvQi $\omega$ 'Hраклєí, and that the Latin pocts from Vergil onwards use Tiryntbius to connote Hercules, is perhaps due to the legend mentioned by Apollodorus (ii. 4. 12) that the name Herakles was given him for the first time by the oracle which ordered his return to Tiryns, after the murder of his children as stated above. For rector of most MSS, which I believe to be a reminiscence of Statius, with whom the word is a favorite, Cannegieter conjectured uictor, which he shows in a learned note to be constantly applied to Hercules. It is interesting to confirm this conj. by the more than respectable testimony of my Brit. Mus, $B$, in which it is the m. prima. Cf. my note on Ibis 500 inuicto deo. infit, like summis ab astris, is a grandiose touch. 6. uocat in sua uota. Conington on Aen. v. 234 shows Vergil to have used in uota uocare four times, Aen. v. ${ }^{2} 34,5$ I 4 , vii. 47 I , xii. 780 . He is wrong, I think, in explaining the meaning to be 'summoning to be a party to a vow'; the idea is rather summoning to help a vow. 7. stimulis. To use the goad was an extreme remedy only to be applied in cases of desperation. Colum. ii. 2. 26 Numquam stimulo lacessat iuuencum. 9. Tunc quoque. His cupidity was over-hasty. sperans uanescere most of the MSS, which is not impossible, as sperare even in Vergil has the sense of apprehending or anticipating evil. Servius on Aen. i. 543 At sperate deos abusiue 'timete' ut alibi Hunc ego si potui tantum sperare dolorem (iv. 419) cum speremus bona, timeamus aduersa. Cf. Val. Fl. iii. 295, Stat. But we retain enough of the Babrian original to see that in it 'גmioas meant 'hoping,' and the variations of the MSS seem to indicate something wrong: $A$ gives spirans, $B$ spernans, $X$ euanescere, B suanescere. Hence 1 follow Wopkens in considering uanescere corrupt, though what the word was which it has ousted is very doubtful. [Interesting, but perhaps hardly probable, is B's spernans, 'disdaining that his covetous aspiration should vanish before him,' i.e. when he thought to realize a gold-harvest, his hopes proved illusory by the goose laying only one egg. Spernans from spernari may be parallelled by Juv. iv. 4 where the Pithoeanus gives spernatur, and Fronto p. 144 Naber spernabere. Both Mayor and Bücheler retain spernatur in Juv. iv. 4.] 6. exosas in sua lucra moras is like admotas in noua damna preces, 'delays hateful for the purposes of his gains,' i.e. which he disliked as retarding his gains. Exosa nauigatio, 'the voyage we hate' is found in Ennod. Dict. xxiv. fin.,

There is much in this fable which is common to Avianus and Phaedrus. The fable of the Ant and the Fly (Phaedr. iv. 24) contains the following verses, 15 sqq.:-

> Ego granum in hiemem cum studiose congero,
> Te circa murum pasci uideo stercore.
> Aras frequentas : nempe abigeris quo uenis.
> Nihil laboras: ideo cum opus est, nihil habes.

Constantini xvi Vt ex inueterato illo torpore ac foedissimis latebris subito prorumperet et consumpto per desidias sexennio ipsum diem natalis sui ultima sua caede signaret. passus all MSS. Fröhner's passust is inadmissible for Avianus. It is probably a mere participle, though the omission of est is found in other writers of the period, e.g. Claud. Epist. iii. 23 Dignatus tenui Caesar scrip-sisse Maroni. transisse, a strict perfect 'to be past and over.' Lucretius' use of the perf. inf. in iii, 69, 70 Dum se falso terrore coacti Effugisse uolunt longe, longeque remosse is very similar. I do not consider any of these perfects to be aoristic.
2. Nec, where Non would be expected, falls under the same class of anomalous constructions as XVII. 13, XXV. 5 , in each of which a nominative participle is followed by a finite verb, but the verb clause is introduced by a que or atque; respondens seque docet, fingens discrimine Atque ... queritur. It is certain that $\mathbb{N e c}$ cannot here $=n e q u i$ dem; and I cannot believe Av. meant it as a mere variation of Non. A very similar anacoluthon is found in Prop. ii. 32.33, 34 Ipsa Venus quamuis corrupta libidine Martis, Nec minus in caelo semper bonesta fuit. uitae is possibly dative, ' apprehended for his life.' Juv. vi. м7 Cum furem nemo timeret Caulibus aut pomis et aperto uiueret borto. 3. Confectus senio. Val. Max. v. i. I Ext. Senio iam confectum militem Macedonem (Canneg.). The balance of the clauses Solibus ereptos hiemi Distulit as well as the use of Distulit, which is somewhat bare if it stands alone, is in favour of the former view. 'aestati praereptos distulit consumendos in hiemem.' (Withof.) On the latter Solibus must ='at midsummer,' 'in summer days.' hiemi, if constructed with Distulit, 'put off,' or 'reserved for winter' (so Guiet), may be compared with Stat. Theb, viii. 687 Crudelis Erinnys Obstat et infando differt Eteoclea fratri, and with Phaedrus' Ego granum in biemem cum studiose congero quoted above. labores, 'fruits of its toil,' Vergilian. Minutius Vita Donati ap. Hagen Anecd. Heluet. p. cclx Hiemis autem tempore solo canente pruina. 8. gelu all MSS, where we might expect niue as in Mamert. Genethl. Maxim. ix Cum agros glacies, glaciem niues premerent. 9. Barth, whom Bährens follows, wished to write Pigranimis, which he called uow noua quiden sed elegantissima. It is so written in $C$ and the Carlsruhe fragment, as reported by Fröhner, cf. exanimis unanimis magnanimis semanimis longanimis pusillanimis. Yet it seems hazardous to ascribe to Av. a word which is not known to exist elsewhere, and the balance of clauses is better preserved by reading Pigra nimis, to which non aequans stands parallel. As Schenkl observes, two reasons are given for the ant's remaining at home, (1) she is numbed with the cold; (z) her body is too small and feeble to face the stormy weather. tanto of some MSS may be right = 'solittle.' Trèves MS tanto modico. 10. umida, 'damp from the moisture sinking through. Plin. H. N. xi. 109 Semina adrosa condunt, ne rursus in frugem exeant e terra. maiora ad introitum diuidunt, madefacta imbre proferunt atque siccant. legit. The Paraphrast has frumentum quod aestate collegerat, exsiccabat, which agrees with the words $\sigma \in \sigma \omega \rho \in \cup$ ќкє. On this view legit is 'picks' or 'sorts' for drying. This is not the ordinary sense of legere with semina, grana, etc. Cf. Ovid's frugilegae fornicae Met. vii. 624, and auidaeque uolucres Semina iacta legunt M. v.

48 f , in both of which the idea is of picking up grain or seed for consumption. And so I think Av. meant here; the ant picks from her store of grain some for the need of the moment. Guict explained 'edit uescitur.' 11. It is hard to choose between Discolor of $O R X$ and Decolor of $A P$ and the Carlsruhe fragm. Though there is some confusion of the two words in MSS, their meanings are on the whole distinct. (i) Discolor is applied to objects which present a mixture of colours, as a tiger's skin (Stat. Theb. ix. 685), a poplar-leaf (S.ii. 3. 51), the rainborv (Theb. x. 119) ; and a cicala would be so called as not uniform in colour, but presenting in its body different hues crossing and intermingling with each other. This would be true of our grass-hoppers, which sometimes combine brown with green or yellow; and it may be equally so of Italian species. (Av. perhaps meant to contrast the motley colours of the cicala with the black hue of the ant, cf. Horace's lit matrona meretrici dispar erit atque Discolor Epp. i. 18.4). (2) Decolor is used of things which have changed or impaired their colour, whether by assuming a darker and dingier tinge, as decolor Indus (of which Passerat on Prop. iv. 3. ro quotes 4 instances), 'the swarthy Oriental,' who has lost the fresh colour of the IVest, or by losing their healthy hue and turning pale, as in Prudentius' decolor inuidia Han. 286. Here Av. might use the word somewhat less particularly, 'dingy' or 'sombre,' to suit the reversed circumstances of the insect now experiencing the shady side of its days.
12. querulo ruperat arua sono, 'had made the fields split.' Vergilian, G. iii. 328 Et cantu querulae rumpent arbusta cicadae. querulo, a word not peculiar to the cicada, but expressing the 'noises' which each animal severally makes, the frog's croak, the she-goat's bleat. Apuleius uses the extraordinary adj. obstrepōrus to express the noise of the cicala (Flor, ii. 13). sono. Hence the Greek names

The threshing-floor is personified as in Verg. G. i. 192, 298. Se quoque, 'she for her part,' i.e. she had had her own occupation like the ant. Verg. E. ix. 51 saepe ego longos Cantando puerum memini me condere soles. 14. explicuisse, 'had worked out or finished off,' 'carried to their end': with some notion, as above XXVII. 10, where see note, of a lengthy and tiresome task: 'extendisse' Guiet. 15. Paruula, 'the tiny one' $=$ formica. From Horace S. i. 2. 33 Paruula nam exemplo est magni formica laboris. So 'hardshell' for tortoise in Uncle Remus xxvi. 16. A parenthesis exactly like XV. 3, 4. continuare, 'to prolong' from year to year, neither of them dying in the winter. (Cannegieter.) 17. En which $C$ alone of my MSS gives is hardly so good as IMi of the rest. The emphatic position of the word at the beginning of the v . is determined by the opposition of At tibi in 19; but instead of the nominative which might be expected, the pronoun is (doubtless for metrical reasons) constructed as part of the protatic clause, just as in Verg. Aen. iv. $340-2$ Me si fata meis paterentur ducere uitam Auspiciis et sponte mea componere curas, Frbem Troianam primum dulcesque meorum Reliquias colerem, the prose order ego or equidem gives way to Me constructed with the hypothetical clause. substantia, 'subsistence,' 'means,' a sense in which it is found in the Dialogus de Oratoribus viii Sine commendatione natalium, sine substantia facultatum. 'Sane est posterioris Latinitatis, uerum imprimis frequens apud ICtos,' Orelli there : but would Tacitus, or whoever wrote this dialogue, have used substantia by itself? At any rate neither Symmachus' Letters nor the l'anegyrici nor Prudentius give any instance ; but Wopkens quotes it from Fulgentius (Myth. iii. 3), Sulpicius Severus (Chron. i. 76), Salvianus, and Aurelius Victor; Hartel's Index to Ennodius shows it was then quite established, and S. Jerome has the diminutive substantiola $=$ ' $a$ little property.'

Cantibus for in cantibus is noticeable. Manilius iv. 157 ed. Bentley Otia et aeternam peragunt in amore iuuentam; in ii. 205 Non tenebris aut luce suam peragentia sortem (Sizna) is justified by the locative sense of the ablatives.

Avianus has here deviated considerably from Babrius. In the Greek fable the mother ape stifles her favorite child by over-caressing; the less favored and discarded child escapes to the desert and comes to maturity. Babrius' version is identical with (1ppiam's, Cyneg. ii. 605 sqq. Schneider :-

1. prōfundens as in Catullus lxiv. 202; and in the hexameters on the Nile ascribed to Claudian xlvii. I2 (xxvii. I2 Jeep). The instance alleged by L. Müller from Lucan vii, 159 is not certain. He shows that in Christian poets the long 0 is of frequent occurrence. (De R. M. p. 363.) 2. 'Allots her children each to a separate destiny.' An inversion of the ordinary construction diuidere uices in pignera (Pers. v. 49 Diuidit in geminos concordia fata duorum). pignera nata. Canneg. quotes from Gruter DCccuiI. 12 P. Memisianae uxori castiss. Q. Herculanius maritus sum pignerib. de ea natis locum consecrauit. Claud. Laus Seren, III non ante suis inpendit amorem Pigneribus. Prud. Cath. x. II9 Nullus sua pignera plangat. The two oldest MSS of Prudentius are very clear for $e$, not $o$, in the oblique cases of pignus. Paris 8084 (in capitals, and perhaps of fifth century) gives pignera P. ii. 523 , C. x. 119, pignere P. iv. 52, pigneribvs Ps. 479. Bodl. Auct. T. 2.22 (of eighth century) gives Cath. X. II9 pignera, Perist. ii. 523 pignera, xi. 210 pigneribus, v. 49 I pigneris, all except the last in the sense of 'child': in Perist. iv. 52 alone pignore, not in the sense of child. 3. caro, 'fond' as an epithet of amore is unusual, but there is no evidence for raro.
2. Alteriusque. It is not true that when unus (alter) is followed by alter, the second alter is always without a copula. Vitruv. iv. 4. 3 Equibus una sit non striata et altera striata. iii. 5. 7 Vnum cum sit positum . . et alterum diducatur. odiis exsaturata from Vergil Aen. vii. 298. Cannegieter's conj. insaturata is plausible; but the word is very rare, though found twice in the Aratea of Avienus, insaturatae odiis Phaen. 183, i, cibi Progn. 513. tumet, 'rankles with excess of hate.' 5. fetam, here of an animal which has recently produced young ones. The ape is tired out with the combined effort of escaping and carrying her young, one on her back, the other supported in her front paws. 10. Oppositum, the burden at her breast, i.e. in front. (Guiet.) Heinsius' Appositum is comparatively weak and without any MS support. remisit is not only given by $P$, the Trèves MS $(T)$, and the Carlsruhe fragm. but was the $m$. pr. of $C$. It is an aoristic perfect. 11. Almost all MSS here agree in giving ab, which with Cataldo Iannelli I retain. It must be constructed with Haeret, 'hangs clinging to the neck.' Yet as $P$ and the first Peterhouse MS give ad, the reading of most edd. at may be right ; and the construction circumdans collo is certainly more simple, Ovid M. ix. 459, 605, vi. 479. 12. 'Shares the flight of his dam against her will.' 13. quoque. See on XVIII. 5. 14. unicus heres. Prud. Cath. xii. 82. Symm. Prudentius, as Krenkel shows p. 8, uses the nominatives cautis famis prolis luis stipis Ioannis and perhaps pubis, for the ordinary forms in -es. Vegetius i. II and 12 uses cratis as nom. for crates; and Av. himself seems to have written uulpis for uulpes in XL.7. The Paris MS of Prudentius, which I examined for this purpose, gives pvbis ominis liqverat C. vii. i62, Lvis incentiva fatigat H. 249, lvis inproba Ps. 508, fanits inpia natos Ps. 479 ; and it is a reasonable conclusion that where metre required a short syllable, the -is form was preferred. None of these however increase in the genitive, and as Priscian i. p. 156 Hertz ranks quadrupes inquies with diues superstes as all ending in $\breve{e} s$, it is clear that the earlier sense of quantity in these final syllables had then been lost, and Av. may have written berěs as Ausonius wrote bipěs tripĕs celeripĕs. auis, probably more after heres (Cic. Fam. xiii. 26 Heres est M. Mindio fratri suo) than Seruatus, though seruare with a dat. is common enough, e.g. in Symmachus' Letters (x. I2 (32)). Titul. Sepulchr. Nicomachi Flauiani C. I. L. vi. I783 SI Eram evem vivere nobis servario vobis qvae verba eivs apv T yos (of the Emperor Theodosius to the Senate) Fvisse plerie. meminisTis optavit. The less favored apeling is left the sole survivor of the name and fortunes of the family, by the death of his over-caressed brother. $15,16$. Hardly by Av. The Latinity wants clearness and point: rursūs before in is less likely to have been introduced as a corruption of something written by Av., than as a prosodial licence common in writers subsequent to him. Yet the fable would end very abruptly with V. I 4 : and Lachmann's conclusion that the whole of wv . $13-16$ is a later addition is critically very probable. 15. 'So it is that many find a pleasure in what they disparaged, and hope, reversing the order of things, brings men of mean estate back to a happier fortune.'
4. rursus, though it is tempting to alter its position and write Rursus spes bumiles, is right where it stands before in meliora.

1. resultans seems to mean 'bounding to and fro,' or 'backwards and forwards.' This sense is post-classical. There is nothing in Babrius corresponding, nor in Halm's prose version. 4. Forre nee expositis MSS mostly. Withof explained expositis as 'open.' 'Exposita iuga uocat montes seu colles herbosos et apricos, et quod maxime uim epitheti exprimit, tales colles qui armentis libere patent, et unde non prohibentur,' p. 281. Cf. Stat. S. i. 2. 34 Licet expositum per limen aperto Ire, redire gradu. Most edd. however, including Guiet, who notes 'i. e. depositis, barbare,' have found the word objectionable : and Ferrea of B, with the omission of nec in $P$, perhaps points to a corruption. I have written Ferre nee haec positis, 'and never to get rid of the yoke and taste the sweets of repose like, mine.' haec, 'such as you see.' So baec deuia, 'your present sidling gait,' III. 5. 5. subiectas seems to suit iugis in the sense of bills. The calf might descend to the grassy ground on the lower part of the slopes, or mount to the woods higher up. discursus all my MSS, 'to range freely over the grass.' 6. rursus, 'and then again, if I am so inclined.' Cf. XXIX. 18. Lachm. preferred sursus as in XV. 8, and Canneg. found sursus in two MSS. But here the antithesis to subiectas is somewhat flat; rursus is more natural and quite in Av.'s manner. opaca, if I need shade. sequi, 'push into the dark depths of the woods.' Vergilian, Aen. ii. 737 auia cursu Dum sequor, v. 629 pelagique extrema sequentem. 7. nullam, 'not for a moment angered by what he said.' 8. solitam, XVII. 5. fessus. Av, is here closer than prata with procubuisse. The ox is removed from the ploughing-field to the meadow. 11. I retain the MS reading, but for innexum write ut nexum. sacris aris, 'sacrificial altars,' or 'altars of divine worship,' to be connected with Admotum as in Luc. i. 608 sacris tunc admoutet aris Electa ceruice marem. Verg. Aen. xii. 171 admouitque pecus flagrantibus aris. Ovid M. xiii. 454 postquam crudelibus aris Admota est. Cannegieter's conj. (accepted by Lachm.) sertis, though well according with innexum (Ovid Trist. v. 3. 3) heaps up the successive clauses sertis innexum, aris admotum, very awkwardly, and could hardly be what Av. wrote. Besides, it only
 'tied with a cord.' 12. popae, genitive on which cultro depends,
'grapple with the knife of the priest's attendant.' Properly the fofin seems to have been distinguished from the cultrarius, Suet. Gaius Caesar 32: here the functions are blended. Both Suetonius and Propertius (iv. 3.62) apply the word succinctus to the popa: see the illustration in Rich. 12. It is difficult to decide between tristis of most MSS and testis of $C$ and the Carlsruhe fragm. If we argue from Babrius, the words ка̀кeivos auvê totád that the calf passed the ox on his way to be sacrificed, are somewhat in favour of testis. Rhythm on the other hand rather supports tristis, which itself well expresses the disastrous consequences of the forbearance (indulgentia) which has left the calf its freedom only to sacrifice it in the end. 15. grauis quamuis, 'however severe.' Quamuis with adjectives almost always precedes, here follows its adj. as licet does even in the polished Merobaudes Paneg. Aetii 70 N , tali residem licet excitat orsu. 16. quam, as if magis preceded: so XLII. I4. tenerum, ' in childhood.' Verg. G. ii. 343 in teneris, Ecl. i. 8 tener agnus. mox peritura, 'idleness doomed after a time to end.' pati. Though used elsewhere in re bona as Forcellini shows from Asin. ii, 2. 58 Fortiter malum qui patitur, idem post patitur (Goetz potitur) bonum. Poen. iii. 3. 83 Siquidem potes pati esse te in lepido loco. Rutil. i. 446 Dum mala formides, nee bona posse pati is here at least half in a bad sense, 'be sentenced or condemned to.' 17, 18. If with most MISS regat is retained in 18, translate, 'This is the lot of men, that the happier die soon, whereas the poor are governed by the uncertainties of a life shifting from day to day.' The two vv. are peculiar and, spite of Lachmann's condemnation, not unworthy of Av. Nevelet's reading m. fel. ut sit Mors cita is against all my MSS ; yet it certainly balances the sounds more effectively sors ista-mors cita. ' Vita diurna est $\epsilon^{\prime} \phi \eta \mu \epsilon ́ \rho \iota o s$, nullum diem secura aut certa sui,' Caspar Barth Aduers. L. 7, rightly, though as both Guiet and Wopkens thought, there may be in diurna some idea of prolongation from day to day. A. Gellius xvii. 2 and Nonius 100 both quote the annalist Claudius Quadrigarius as using diurnare $=$ diu uiuere : an inscript. in Gruter has diurno parasito Apollinis $=$ ' $q$ qui quotidie epulabatur in synhodo Apollinis' (Forc.) ; and diurnis diebus in the medical writer Caelius Aurelianus='every day.' Cf. XXXIII. 16 uota diurna. But regat is, to say the least, somewhat forced; and if we remember the close resemblance in some of the earlier forms of writing between $n$ and $r$ is very likely to be a corruption of negat, which is actually given by two Brit. Mus. MSS, $B$ and $b^{2}$. $B$ had also as m. pr. miseris, and this gives a good sense, 'whilst the life they lead day after day (prolonged from day to day) says no (Nulli negare soleo Plaut. Stich. i. 3. 28) to the wretched,' i.e. will not permit them to die. Or again, regat may be a corruption of necat, the sense being 'the happy die soonest, whereas the wretched are slain day after day by the unhappy lives they lead.' This would agree with the common use of enecare in Plaut. and Terence for plaguing to death. [This conj. of my own I have decided to admit as more direct and intelligible than either of the other readings.]

\text { Babr. c, Fab. Aesop. } 278

The leading idea of this fable, the contrast of pampered slavery that hugs its chains with hungry independence, is presented in more than one form in the Aesopian collection. Here and in Fab. Aesop. 278 we have a dog and lion; Aesop. 32 I brings before us a tame ass which feeds well and becomes sleek, but is beaten severely by its master, and a wild ass which at first discontented with its rough life is consoled by seeing the rigorous treatment its domesticated brother has to endure.

Phaedrus has a long fable identical with this, except that a wolf takes the place of Av.'s lion (iii. 7). He prefaces it with the words Quam dulcis sit libertas, breuter proloquar, a line which to the degenerate Romans of the declining Empire would have had little meaning, but in the age of Tiberius was very significant.

Babr. c.

1. exhausto $=$ exbaustis uiribus, 'worn out,' as Lucan says iv. 622 Exbausitque uirum. Juv. ix. 59. 2. insertis. Quintilian ii. 10.9 uses inserere iocos of introducing jests into rhetorical language. Ovid Trist. ii. 444 Historiae turpes inseruisse iocos, of weaving jokes into the texture of history. Av. means scarcely more than 'adding gibes' nearly = iocans. Possibly we should read intortis like intorquere contumelias Cic. Tusc. Disp. iv. 36. 77. uerba dedisse like insertis iocis shows how the correct feeling of language had declined. As in IX. 20 it=locutus esse, but without the epithets which there take from the strangeness of the expression. In classical Latin uerba dare $=$ 'to deceive': Ter. Eun. Prol. 24 is a double entendre which proves nothing. Cf. the definition of Symmachus in the Explanat. in Donat. Grammat. Lat. Keil iv. 488 Symmachus sic: uerba dare captiuci est, argentum dare satellitis. 3. duplici tergo was explained by Heinsius Advers. p. 611 as lato tergo, like Vergil's duplex agitur per lumbos spina, which Servius interprets lata and Oppian's $\Delta \iota \pi \lambda \grave{a}$ dè oí $\mu \epsilon \tau$ tómıc $\theta \epsilon$ $\mu \epsilon \tau a ́ \phi \rho \in \nu a, \pi i o \nu a$ a $\quad \eta \mu \omega \hat{\omega}$. If this is so, the abl. can only loosely be constructed with tendantur, 'how my flanks dilate (swell) and my back rises in a double ridge.' It seems more likely that tergo is here used more indefinitely of the ridge or projecting surface of the skin covering the dog's flanks, which is called double from the inequalities produced by the outstanding muscle or fat: for it can hardly be simply=tergore or cute, as explained in some of the mediaeval glosses. Another view has been suggested to me by my friend Mr. C. N. Eliot, viz, that duplici tergo means the point where the spine parts off into the haunches; but $A v$. seems to be imitating Vergil here as in 4. tendantur, 'dilate,' 'are distended,' Col. vi. 14. 4 Intumescit collum, neruique tenduntur. 4. Verg. G.iii. 87 Luxuriatque toris animosum pectus, where animosum corresponds to Av.'s nobile. 5. Proximus with humanis mensis. The dog is most in the confidence of man and is admitted to the nearest place at his table. post otia is obviously modelled on Phaedr. iii. 7. 13, 14, where the dog says to the wolf Quanto est facilius mibi sub tecto uiuere, Et otiosum largo satiari cibo. It is true that in Amm. Marc, xyi. 12. 9 post otium cibigue refectionem, Paneg. Maxim. et Constantin. xii Bährens multo magis mirum est te imperium ferre post otium, the words mean 'after resting,' whereas here they must mean 'when resting-time has set in.' But this is scarcely reason enough for altering them. 6. Communem, 'shared with my master.' Phaedr. iii. 7. 21 Adfertur ultro panis; de mensa sua Dat ossa dominus, frusta iactat familia Et quod fastidit quisque pulmentarium. Poseidonius ap.

good fare. Lachmann's rasa is however very plausible, for Babrius has клоњ̣ тє́трьттта ८ ба́pка, Phaedrus iii. 7. 15 adspicit Lupus a catena collum detritum cani. malum, hardly the interjection (see Munro, Elucid. of Catullus, xxix. 21, p. 102), but mockingly 'what is that villainous chain round your throat?' Catullus' mala tussis is somewhat similar, xliv. 7. 8. 'That when I have guarded the house (by night) I may not be free to leave it (by day).' Phaedr. iii. 7. I8 Quia uideor acer, adligant me interdiu, Luce ut quiescam, et uigilem nox cum uenerit. 9. moribundus, 'ready to die' with hunger: Phaedr. iii. 7.6 Ego qui sum longe fortior, pereo fame. lustra, ' wilds,' where no food is to be got. 12. Dum, 'till,' i. e. with the prospect of eventually being fed for your services. faciles, 'easily won,' opp. to the difficulty of getting food in the woods. 13. collectus in iram = se colligens in $i$. Lucan uses colligere iram of a lion, i. 205 Sic cum squalentibus aruis Aestiferae Libyes uiso leo comminus boste Subsedit dubius, totam dum colligit iram, Mox ubi se saeuae stimulauit uerbere caudae Erexitque iubam et uasto graue murmur biatu Infremuit: and so Val. Fl.vii. 335 morituraque conligit iras, where Burmann quotes Stat. Theb. xii. 759 extrema se conligit ira. 14. It is hard to decide whether this is anacoluthon like XXV. 5, 6, or collectus and Atque ferox animi are both nominatives to agit. The former is perhaps more in Av.'s manner. See XVI. 12, XVII. I3. ferox animi, ' in pride of soul.' nobile, 'a generous' growl. agit, 'heares' or 'gasps forth': on the analogy of animam agere. 15. meritis, 'as it deserves': see on XVII. 5. 16. 'And let your hunger be a set-off to the galling of your chain,' i.e. an excuse which may be alleged on the other side. With a similar inversion Horace says S. i. 3.70 mea compenset uitiis bona, meaning ' counterbalance my vices by my virtues,' 'set my virtues against my vices,' see A. Palmer in loc. The sense can hardly be 'let your chains counterbalance (i.e. be set in the scale against) the gratification of your hunger,' which forces famem orer-much. Conpescant is not found in any of the earliest MSS, and is in any case 'durius dictum' as Wopkens remarked. dura, MSS, like Prud. Psych. Praef. 2I, c. Symm. i. 473. Wopkens preferred dira, 'quod nonnisi horum gestandorum pretio acquireret cibos de quibus gloriabatur.' 17. 'When I return in freedom to my solitary cavern, famished as I am I start for any field I wish.' mea libertas = ego liber. redditur of MSS must not be altered to redditor (Withof), which would necessitate changing peto to petam. In itself the emendation is a good and likely one: in Orientius Common. i. 52 propriis consequitor meritis is a certain restoration of Delrio's for the MS consequitur. 19. 'Remember to commend this rich living, not to the lovers of independence, but to those who have renounced freedom for gluttony.' Has, this good feeding of yours, like baec otia in XXXVI. 4. potius, 'preferably,' i. e, rather than to those who like me love their freedom.

XXXVIII.

I have not found any Greek fable corresponding to this in Halm ; and it is not in our Babrius.

1. torrente, abl. absolute, 'by the rushing of the river.' Verg. E. vii. 52 torrentia fumina. coactus, forced to quit the depths of the river, where the water was sweet, for the salt water of the sea. By stagnis Av. seems to mean the water at the bottom of the river, much as Vergil says Aen. x. 765 medii per maxima Nerte Stagna. Ovid F. iii. 647, S Cismiger banc tumidis rapuisse Numicius undis Dicitur et stagnis occuluisse suis. 2.
praeceps obibat, 'darted to and fro.' 3. squamigerum agmen, 'the scaly company.' So Lucretius uses squamigeri=pisces, i. 37 I , $3 \mathrm{i}^{\text {s }}$, cf.
squamigerum genus i. I62 (Munro). improbus, àvå̊'ns (Munro on Lucr. iii. 1026). So XLII. 12. 4. nobilitate, 'gentility.' 5. Non tulit, 'could not put up with the airs of the ejected fish.' Vergilian, Aen. viii. 256 , ix. 622 , xii. 37 I. expulsum represents the point of view of the habitual occupants of the sea (patrio sub gurgite). phoecis of $C$ and the Carlsruhe fragm. accounts for phocas, the reading of most MSS. It is another spelling of pbycis, cf. Poenicus Punicus, poeniceus puniceus, moenia munia, etc. (Roby L. G. i. p. 84). Pliny H. N. xxxii. 150 mentions the phycis as a rock fish (saxatilium), in ix. 8I as changing its hue at different times, in spring parti-coloured, generally white: and as the only fish which constructs a nest of sea-weed in which it brings forth its young. Pliny's description is throughout of a sea-fish, which also suits the etymology ( $\phi \hat{\text { íkos alga) Oppian "A } \lambda_{\iota \epsilon v \tau . ~ i . ~}^{\text {I }}} 122$ sqq. cited by Cannegieter metre. The Gale MS, as reported by Bährens, gives cum sociis, a manifest interpolation, and without much point, for the force of the fable lies greatly in the sharp contrast of the two fishes. Pet ${ }^{2}$ has cum reprebensionibus written over cum salibus; possibly this gloss has remained after the word it explained had become corrupted; and for salibus we should read sannis, 'derisive scoffs.' Juvenal (vi. 306) and Persius (i. 62, v. 91) both use the word: the Schol. on Pers. i. 62 explains Sanna dicitur os distortum cum uultu: quod facimus cum alios deridemus. Like $\mu v \chi \theta \iota \sigma \mu$ ós sanna expresses the act of forcing the breath through the nostrils and the scornful sound thus produced, 'reuocato naribus spiritu insultare' Schol. Juv. I.c.

2. laboratis, 'studied' to give what he said a look of plausibility (Cannegieter). The idea is perhaps an extension of this, 'magniloquent.' Or is it 'fabricated' and so 'unreal'? 8. Quaeque, i.e. uana mendacia et quae refutari queant. See on XXXIII. 2. refutari, 'disproved.' Mamertin. Grat. Actio Iuliano v Si enim comminisci aliqua flagitia temptassent, facile ipso splendore laudis et gloriae refutarentur. te quoque teste, 'by the evidence of your own eyes' (Canneg.). 9. eat is Bährens' emendation for erit of MSS : which however can hardly be considered certainly wrong in the Latin of Av. There is, too, something unusual, perhaps over-pompous, in eat; cf. however XVII.6. 10. Si pariter, i. e. should both be taken in some fisherman's net. umida lina trahant, from Vergil G. i. 142 pelagoque alius trabit umida lina. 11. nobilior, of rank or consideration. See on XXIII. 3, 4 Nobilis bunc... Mercari cupiens. 12. simul, 'eodem tempore,' Wopkens. The word points the contrast. aere breui, 'for a brass farthing.' debile, XVI. 12. The sense seems to be 'insignificant,' but I have not been able to find it elsewhere, unless this is the meaning of Capitolinus Vit. Maximi et Balbini xiv Cum Balbinus Maximum quasi ignobilem contemneret, Maximus Balbinum quasi debilem calcaret. In Stat. Theb. iii. 563 nos prauum ac debile uulgus Scrutari penitus superos, the best MSS seem to give flebile. The phycis is often mentioned by the writers of the Middle and New Comedy as a good fish for eating. Diphilus of Siphnos in his Kock, Antiphanes fr. 132 K., Ephippus fr. 12 K., Mnesimachus ap. Athen. 403 b. Anaxandrides in his Protesilaus introduced boiled phycides (Athen. I3Ie). Their being so often alluded to by Athenaeus is a proof of the high estimation in which they were held by epicures.

See my note on Catull. ci. 7. 11. uentis et cantibus, 'with blasts of wind and sounding tones,' a sufficiently apt phrase to express the function of a trumpet. None of the modern emendations uanis ego cantibus Lachm., suetis ex c. Bährens, are as plausible as the interpolated reading of the Brit. Mus. Reg. 15 A. vii uentis erranti-Paraphrast words it. It is a variation on Vergil's totamque sub arma coactam Hesperiam Aen. vii. 43. Ovid's arma coacta, 'unavoidable war' (Trist. iv. 9.8) is quite different. 12. 'And even this only with a subdued sound, be the stars themselves my witness.' The trumpet is hardly loud enough for the stars to hear. summisso, like summittere wocem, orationem in Quintilian. $R$ glosses the word by bumili.
13. resultantem addens, 'jerking on the fire and making it rebound.' I see no reason for believing with Unrein p. 42 that resultare here $=$ recusare or aduersari in which sense it is used by Cassiodorius Hist. Eccles, v. II Iudaei tentabant resultare Romanis, and Gregory of Tours Hist. Franc. x. 15 Resultare coepimus dicentes, quod non accederemus ad bunc locum: to which add Sidon. viii. I4 difficultas resultat optatis, vii. 2 ueritati resultantia. flammis crepitantibus. Lucretian, vi. 155 laurus Terribili sonitu flamma crepitante crematur. Verg. Nunc, 'now', after what you have confessed. maior, 'an extra severity of punishment and pain.' dolorque: possibly culorque, as suggested by B's colorque, is right, 'fiery punishment '? 15. temptare, 'try anything aggressive.' ausis, as my excellent Brit. Mus. MS $B$ gives, is clearly right. No greater proof of its value could be, for all the other, even the earliest MSS, have ausus. 16. Saeuior hoc, 'you are a fiercer foe to deal with in so far as you make others quarrel.' hoc, 'for this reason,' referring to quod facis. The omission of es after Saeuior is unusual : see on XXXIV. i. In the somewhat later Commonitorium of Orientius it is tolerably frequent.

XL.

A fine fable on the frailness of beauty in comparison with mental gifts. The Babrian original is lost, but is almost recoverable in the prose velsion of the Bodleian Paraphrast ${ }^{1}$. See Eberhard 137 , Gitlbauer 172 .

A very similar fable, but in which the interlocutors are a wolf and a fox, is still extant No. IOI in our Babrius. There a wolf that from his fine size and shape was ealled 'lion' by his brother wolves, quits their suciety for the company of lions
 'I pray to be saved from your delusions: among wolves you may be a lion, but among lions you are assuredly a wolf.'

'Once a leopard spotted gaily and beauteous of breast went to parade himself among his fellow-beasts. But finding that the lions were surly and had no rich colour on their skins, that instant he concluded them to be a sorry breed. The other brutes he damned for a mean-looking lot, and found he was himself the one sole pattern of nobility. A wily fox seeing him so proud of his spring-like attire took him to task and showed that his fine

[^10]markings were a delusion. "Go thy ways," said he, "put the prodigal's trust in thy blazon'd youth, if thou wilt : only let me have the fairer possession, understanding; and let us own the fascination that comes of mental adornment rather than of glittering personal advantages." '

1. maculis. Plin. H. N. viii. 62 Panthera et tigris macularum uarietate prope solae bestiarum spectantur. Pantheris in candido breues macularum oculi. II. x. 29 тарঠàє́ŋ поккì $\eta$. pectore, the reading of all early MSS, is to be preferred to corpore (1) from the pleasing allitteration pulchro pectore pardus; (2) from the fine contour of the leopard's neck and chest. pardus. Leopards and panthers, from their combined grace of form, colour, and movement, are natural types of beauty. Wordsworth Ruth 37 He quas a lovely youth! I guess The panther in the wilderness Was not so fair as be. From the earliest period of the Roman Empire to the latest no gift was more acceptable to the Roman people than these graceful but fierce habitants of the jungle. Mamertinus in his Panegyric addressed to Maximianus says of the Persian King (c. x) Offert interim uaria miracula, eximiae pulcritudinis feras mittit. 2. consimiles seems to express the Babrian oúpфuえot (ci, 4). Lachm, went on to infer that the rest of Av.'s verse must correspond to the Babrian $\tau \hat{\omega} \nu$ ibat inira of the earliest MSS abnuit ire; which is accepted by Schenkl. With Bährens, I doubt the soundness of this emendation. For (I) Sed in 3 is then awkwardly explained by the negative idea in abnuit, instead of marking a distinct opposition, as it surely ought; (2) ibat is the recurring $\eta_{\eta} \in \iota$ of Babrius (Rutherford's Index gives five examples) and the prose fables. What then is inira for which $P$ gives mira, RT inire; $A \mathrm{~m}$. sec., the two Peterhouse MSS, my $X$, and the valuable $B$, ibat in arua? It seems hardly probable that in arua should appear in the strange form of in ira; and there is some force in Withof's objection that the pard would be more likely to go into the jungle than the fields. Withof's own conj. bonore, 'his co-mates in distinction' would have a significance if we regard the fable as aimed at the purpurati and gaily-drest officials of the Imperial Court of the fourth and fifth centuries: bonore indeed would suggest both ideas, official rank and splendid exterior (see on XV. 9). On this point of view we might illustrate from the Panegyrici. Mamertin. Grat. Act. Iuliano xxx Paene intra ipsas palatinae domus ualuas lecticas consulares iussit inferri et cum bonori eius uenerationique cedentes sedile illud dignitatis amplissimae recusaremus, suis prope nos manibus impositos mixtus agnini togatorum praeire pedes coepit . . . Credet hoc aliquis qui illa purpuratorum uidit paulo ante fastidia? qui ideo tantum bonorem in suos ne inhonoros contemnerent conferebant. Yet there is something forced and unlike Av.'s ordinaty style in ibat standing thus isolated: may the right reading be in ora? The pard went to parade bimself among the beasts his compeers. A similar corruption of letters is found in XXXVII. 8 where for abire was at first written in $C$ abore. For the sense cf. Ovid Pont. iv. 6, I8 Vestra procul positus carmen in ora dedi; similarly in ore Trist. iv. 1. 68 Güthling Viuere quam miserum est inter Bessosque Getasque Illum qui populi semper in ore fuit. Prop. iii. 13. 12 Ett spolia opprobrii nostra per ora trabit. Symm. Epist. x. 32 sit in ore plurimorum, of Practextatus to whom a statue was to be erected. 3. nulla. See on XXXVI. 7. Calp. Ecl. iii. 5 Iam dudum nullis dubitaui crura rubetis Scindere. graues might seem here to mean 'strong-scented,' for Pliny describes the lion as having grauem odorem, nec minus balitum H. N. viii. 46 . The v. would then carry a double reproach, 'the lions had a noisome smell and showed no fine colours in their skin.' This would agree with the fact stated also by Pliny (viii. 62) that the peculiar odour of the panther has a strange attraction (mire solicitari) for all other quadrupeds: and the contrast of the two animals would be complete. On the other hand, lightness and agile grace of movement is as marked a characteristic of the panther and the leopard as a grave and even heavy demeanour of the lion: qualities which again part off into sprigbtliness on one side, surliness on the other. uariarent terga, 'spotted their backs' = uariata $t$. baberent. Pliny mentions as one kind of pard uaria viii. 63 and 6. 4. Protinus, 'he concluded without more ado': as we might sordenti uultu MSS, 'as mean-looking.' Martial has Dum nutla teneri sordent lanugine uultus i. 32. 5 : but this ill defends the MS reading, as there sordent $=$ ' is discoloured.' Hence Lachm.'s emend, cultu is probable, cf. amictu in 7 : the attire is of course the skin. damnans, absolutely 'rejecting, vilipending,' our 'damning,' as several times in Pliny xx. 77 in totum damnauit serim, xi. 4 fastidio damnare. Sil. vi. 448 patrios damnare penates Absiste. This is more natural than to take uultu as abl. after damnans, 'condemning of,' 'holding guilty of ' an ignoble look: though this is common enough.
2. 'Was himself the one sole pattern of aristocratic breeding.' in exemplum: frequent in Quintilian. ii. I. 4 I Vhant de schola controuersiam proponam in exemplum. xii. 2.27 In exemplum bene dicendi facundissimum quemque proponet sibi ad imitandum. v. 12.2I Cum corpora quam speciosissima fingendo pingendoue efficere cuperent, numquam in bunc ceciderunt errorem ut Bagoam aut Megabyzum aliquem in exemplums operis sumerent sibi. 7. arguta, 'shrewd': from which quality the fox was called кє $\rho \delta \dot{\omega}, \kappa \iota \delta a ́ \phi \eta$, кьסaфí $\omega$. nouo, hardly 'rare,' 'strange,' like noua figura oris Ter. Eun. ii. 3.25, which expresses the opposite of a common or every-day beauty (Donatus in loc.), arbor mira et noua Fronton. Epist. ii. II Naber, but 'fresh.' The pard was in the first flush of his youthful beauty. uulpis is guaranteed by $C$ and the Trèves MS : and ef. XXXV.14. Otherwise the remarkable v.l. of $B$, gädentem uulgus, might seem to point to a different reading, fraudantem or ludentem unl gus, like Ovid's Indoctum uana dulcedine fallere uulgus M. v. 308. We must then suppose that arguta, ' the shrewd one' =uulpes, like paruula, ' the ant,' XXXIV. 15, auritulus, 'the ass,' laniger, 'the sheep,' in Phaedrus i. If. 6, i. i. 6, domiporta, 'the snail,' $=$ Hesiod's ферє́oгкоs E.к. 'H. 571 , àvóotєos, 'the cuttlefish,' ib. 52\%. 8. uanas, 'neutiquarn eius momenti de quibus merito sic se iactare pardus possit.' Wopkens. approbat, 'shows convincingly.' Wopkens quotes Lamprid. Vit. Alex. Seueri 19 Quasi falsi rei (Casaubon falsarii) adprobati. Spartian. Vit. Getae 6 Vt postea nece Pertinacis est adprobatum. Add Veget. ii. is Lang Tunc enim difficile commeatus dabatur nisi causis iustissimis adprobatis. 9. Vade age, but not Vade alone, is Vergilian. pictae. Canneg. quotes Mart. i. 105. I Picto quod iuga delicata collo Pardus sustinet. The word aptly expresses the painted coat of the panther. iuuentae, as we might say 'the rich blazon of thy youth.' Those who would substitute figurae would convert poetry into prose. Merobaudes ii. I Nieb. pulcbram domini sortita iuuentam. 10. pulchrius suggests the bodily beauty with which the mental adornment of wise counsel is here contrasted. esse queat has its full meaning 'so long as I am permitted to surpass you in fine counsel.' Wopkens wrongly explained it as a pleonasm for sit: cf. XLII. 9. I cannot think Fröhner's rear, though admitted by Schenkl, necessary. 11. Miremurque depends on Dum. 12. corporeis bonis, 'advantages of person.' For the sentiment cf. Mamertin. Grat. Act. Iuliano xi Facile fuit iureni dignitati corporis decorem animi praeponenti et candorem decolorare et oris nitorem alti inpressis cicatricibus deuenustare. Sidon. Epist. v. The skin in this prose fable takes the place of the jar in Avianus. Whether Babrius was here Av.'s model is uncertain.

1. Inpulsus. It is the clouds, rather than the rain-shower, which strictly speaking are pushed by the force of the winds. Lucr. vi. 509 Confertae nubes ui uenti mittere certant Dupliciter: nam uis uenti contendit et ipsa Copia nimborum turba maiore coacta (' when a greater mass than usual has gathered,' Munro), Vrget de supero premit ac facit effluere imbres. pressa nube coactus, 'driven into a mass by the pressure of the clouds upon each other.' Lucr, vi. $5^{17}$ Sed uemens imber fit, ubi uementer utraque Nubila ui cumulata premuntur et impete uenti, a passage which describes the same two sources of heavy rain as Av.: (1) the accumulated pressure of the clouds, (2) the impetuous shock of the wind. 2. Ruperat se with hibernis aquis, 'had burst in a fall of winter rain.' Se ruperat is Vergilian, Aen. xi. $544^{8}$ tantus se nubibus imber Ruperat. Cf. G. i. 446 . 3. effusas, 'wide-spread,' to mark the far-reaching extent of the inundation. Tac. Germ. 30 Non ita effusis ac palustribus locis ut ceterae ciuitates in quas Germania patescit. Luc. viii. 369 effusaque plano Tigridis arua solo. But it is not to be denied that the v . seems to be an imitation of Vergil's eff uso stagnantem fumine Nilum G. iv. 288, and it is possible Av. meant not so much ' wide-spread ' or 'open,' as spreading into a flood with the gradual increase of the rainy deluge. stagnaret, covered the land like a lake or pool, the consequence of the overflow. Conington on G. iv. 288. 4. Expositum, 'set in the open air.' fictile opus, 'a jar of earthenware.' pressit: not 'sank' as Canneg. thought, for a dialogue follows : but 'bore down upon' nearly = 'struck or smote upon.' 5. Mobile, 'plastic,' as in Vergil's mobilis aetas G. iii. ı65, and so the younger Pliny, Epist. vii. 9. II Vt laus est cerae, mollis cedensque sequatur Si doctos digitos iussaque fiat opus . . . Sic bominum ingenium flecti ducique per artes Non rigidas docta mobilitate decet. The other sense of 'moving in a wheel,' 'whirling,' is commoner, especially in Prudentius, e.g. Apoth. 21 o Cuius ad arbitrium sphera mobilis atque rotunda Voluatur; but here the clay has already passed through the wheel and assumed its shape. Nobile, a v.l. mentioned by Iannelli would be quite classical. Pliny, when speaking of uasa figlina, says xxxv. 6 or Retinet banc nobilitatem et Arretium in Italia... Habent et Trallis ibi opera sua et in Italia Mutina, quoniam et sic gentes nobilitantur. It would be 'rare.' instruit, 'forms,' ' prepares.' 7. perquirit, classical from Plautus onwards. 8. Immemor' sui, 'forgetting itself' in its presumption, and assuming the style and title of a finished jar of the largest size. The hiatus after sui is probably as Av. wrote the v., since there is no other sign of disturbance as there seems to be in XXVIII. 12, XXVII. 10. Else it would be easy to read Immemor olla sui est 'Amplora dicor' ait ; and Iannelli found est in his MS. 9. docta manus, 'craftsman's hand': Pliny's docti digiti. Nunc, 'as you see me now, 'under present circumstances' deprecatingly. The jar seems to hint 'the state in which you see me is on the way to something more complete. I am already shaped to become when baked a perfectly tempered amphoma. This prowes the jar was not yet broken, and still retained the fine shape and outline given it by the wheel. rapiente uolumina gyro, 'as the wheel speeds on in its revolution.' Ovid M. ii. 71 celerique uoiumine torquet. gyro, 'the rota' (Plin. xxxv. 159), or orbis (Plin. vii. 198), a wheel used in making pottery. 10. Molliter with obliquum, 'has given my side a gentle inclination,' i.e. not a coarse or gross shape, but a finely convexed, gradually sloping, outline. 11. Hactenus, 'up to this time and no longer.' Pacat. Paneg. Theodos. xlvii Hactenus memet, Imperator Auguste, praeteritas res tuas attrectare fas fuerit. Verg. Aen, vi. 62 Hac Troiana temus fuerit fortuna secuta. figura, perhaps 'fine shape,' as in Cat. lxiii. 6z. 12. subiectam, 'shall plunge you in its waters and wash you away.' Whatever the source of Cabeliauius' pelluet, it would not be the right word here: for according to Fronto p. 64 Naber Os colluere dicam, pauimentum autem in balneis pelluere, non colluere: lacrimis uero genas labere dicam, non pelluere neque colluere. accepto uiolentius amne fatiscens. Vergilian, Aen. i. 123 Accipiunt inimicum imbrem rimisque fatiscunt. violentius with accepto, 'drawing in the flood with a rush and cracking open.' 14. 'It gave way and dashed head-long into the flowing waters.' tenues, as an epithet of aquas, occurs twice in the Georgics, iii. 335 Tum tenuis dare rursus aquas, iv. 410 Aut in aquas tenuis dilapsus abibit. Conington on this last passage compares the Homeric íypóv, and this is obviously Av.'s meaning, 'flowing.' The edition of 1494 glosses the word by liquidas. uicta. Withof compares Val. Fl. iv. 48 Victa fatiscit aquis donec domus, baustaque fluctu est. 15. Infelix, quae. Verg. Aen. ii. 345 Infelix quae non sponsae praecepta furentis Audierit. magna, the proud style of an Amphora. 16. pharetratis MSS, and so in the verses on the winds printed in Reyfferscheid's Suetoni Reliquiae p. 305 Mollior occiduos zephirus lambendo Britannos, (Dicitur Italiae sed et iste fauonius orae) Arma pharetratae labefactat uitrea brumae. The clouds discharge from their full quivers the arrows of storm. Merobaudes Paneg. Aetii 123 Mox iaculum petiere manus, lusitque gelatis Imbribus et siccis imitatus missile lymfis Temptauit pugnas shows that the resemblance of stiff icicles to pointed darts was sufficiently familiar to be introduced as a poetical conceit. The Trèves MS glosses faretrate dicuntur nubes quod imbres atque fulmina de se emittant. Yet there is some plausibility in the conj. Ausa erat iratis (Ellis, after Frölner), cf. O miserum, cui peccare licebat ! Cicero ap. August. de C.D.v. 27, or Ausa foret tantis (Bährens, after Wopkens). 17, 18 are considered spurious by Lachm. If $u t$ in 18 were indubitable, metre would be a strong argument against their genuineness: and the fable ends sufficiently well with v .16 . But $B$ gives ne for $u t$, as Withof subsequently conjectured, and ne is also in the ed. of I494. Hence I have not ventured to mark them as suspicious. 17. 'This may serve as a warning to the weak, not to place their destiny in the power of the great, and then deplore its unhappiness.' miseros, in a general sense ' mean men,' i.c. of no consideration 'debiles,' ed. 1494: or possibly like $\delta_{\epsilon} \lambda \lambda_{o}$, 'base born,' in opposition to high rank (nobilibus). This is the view of the commentator of ed. I 494 : 'Reprehenduntur in hoc apologo omnes de infimo et uili genere exeuntes et de clara parentela se esse mentientes.'

This is the same fable as Ar.'s, but substitutes a lamb for the Latin poet's kid. It seems to have been written while sacrifices in heathen temples were still permitted, i.e. between 34 IA A. D. when a law of Constantius forbade sacrificiorum insaniam and the edicts of Theodosius by which the same law was reenacted under severer penalties at the close of the fourth century.

1. melior cursu like Vergil's pedum melior motu Aen. v. 430, pedibus longe melior Aen. ix. 556 (Koch-Georges Wörterbuch p. 53). The Bodl. MIS R glosses the word by uelocior. deluserat, 'had baffled.' Hor. S. ii. 2. 56 coruum deludet biantem. 2. uicinis seems to be dat. after Proxima, 'fields nearest to huts adjoining,' where the kid would be in reach of protectors, and the wolf would have to keep out of sight. uicinis is thus scarcely more than an amplification of Proxima. dum petit, sc. baedus. casis, straw-roofed huts used by herdsmen or rustics. Sidon. vii. 21, 22 Angulus iste placet paupertinusque recessus Et casa cui culmo culmina pressa forent. Isid. Origin. xv. 12. I Casa est agreste babitaculum palis atque uirgultis barundinibusque contextum, quibus possint bomines tueri a ui frigoris uel caloris iniuria. 3. fugam tendens, Vergilian, Aen. ix. 781 Quo deinde fugam, quo tenditis? inquit. in moenia is explained by urbem in 5, a walled town where there was no fear of wolves or depredators. 4. astitit, all the best MSS. There seems to be hardly more force in the preposition than in Verg. Aen. ii. 328 Arduus armatos mediis in moenibus adstans Fundit ecus where Servius notes 'pro stans.' It is perhaps truer to say that Av. has followed the Vergilian use by which the word is combined with another preposition followed by a case ante oculos adst. Aen. iii. r 50 , iuxta genitorem adst. vii. 72. astitit, from this point of view, repeats the notion of Inter. (See Koch-Georges s.u.) 5. Inpiger secutusque, untiring, and therefore following the kid right into the city. See on XVII. 13. Fröhner's mediam usque secutus is clever but unnecessary. Mamertin. Paneg. Maximian. x Regionem quam saepe uno die impiger uiator emensus est, 'an active or brisk traveller.' Ovid M. i. 778 Aethiopasque suos, positosque sub ignibus Indos Sidereis transit, patriosque adit impiger ortus. raptor, Verg. Aen. ii. 355 lupi ceu Raptores. .. 6. compositis, 'studied,' 'artificial': a frequent use in Quintilian. Spalding cites viii. Pr. 23 ficta atque composita. 7. cunctis, VIII. 10, XIX. 10. The wolf tries to frighten the kid by appealing to his immediate surroundings. They are in a city, therefore with temples visible everywhere around them: in every one of these temples a victim bleeds. uictima, in combination with cunctis templis, points to a time before Paganism had succumbed to Christianity. Sce above on XXIII. 5. 8. Inmitem, 'relentless,' taking no notice of the blood that falls upon it. regemens ORSI, regimens $P$, of which redimens in $C$ is only a farther corruption. The word is used twice by Statius, from whom Sidonius has borrowed it. Theb. v. 388 dat operta fragorem Pinus et abiunctis regemunt tabulata cauernis, viii. 17 Tunc regemunt pigrique lacus uastaeque paludes. Sid. C. xi, 123 per bifores regemunt caua buxa cauernas. cruentet, as tendantur, Luxuriet in XXXVII. 3, 4. The indicative cruentat (BPSX) would be like Vergil's Nonne uides croceos ut Tmolus odores India mittit ebur? 9. Quod nisi, not before Cic. Verr. ii. 66 Quod nisi Metellus hoc tam grauiter egisset, Drïger IIstor. Synt. ii. p. 490, who adkls four other instances from Cicero. It is found in Vergil Ecl. ix. I 4 , G. i. I 55 . securo, as applied to a safe place, is not very common. Forc. quotes Liv. xxxix. I Hostis leuis et uelox et repentinus qui nullum usquam tempus, nullumn locum quietum aut securum esse sineret. ualeas is not otiose as Wopkens thought ; the sense is 'unless you succeed in escaping from the city with its temples and sacrifices to the undisturbed seclusion of the fields.' 10. I follow Lachm. in writing Ei mihi with $R$ in preference to Ha miki which has most of the earlier MSS to support it. The instances of beufollowed by an accus. pronoun and an adj. in agreement with it beu me miserum, etc., are undoubted; beu misero mibi Ritschl's MSS in Merc. iii. 4. 76, beu miserae mibi Merc. iv. 3. 2 : but in Prop. i. 3. 37, iv. 1. 58 , iv. 8. 48 , the Neapolitanus reads ei mibi: and in Verg. Aen. xi. 57 none of Ribbeck's primary MSS give beu mibi. In ro passages of Ovid's Tristia Mr. S. G. Owen's three best MSS give Ei bei $i$ or et mibi, never beu. If Heu mibi was sometimes substitued for Hei mibi, the cases are exceptional, and not generally supported by early MSS. It is unfortunate that Prudentius who several times uses beu alone, does not seem to combine either beu or ei with a personal pronoun; had he done so the question might have been almost settled by the invaluable Paris codex. uittata. Verg. G. iii. 486 stans bostia ad aram Lanea dum niuea circumdatur infula uitta. 11. Ille refert, Vergilian. Modo quam MSS, changed unnecessarily by Lachm. to mibi quam. It is however not easy to decide whether modo is to be constructed with metuis, 'you have just been apprehending,' 'you have just explained your fears of,' cf. aduenis modo Ter. Hec. iii. 5. 8, modo thus expressing 'tempus tam proximum ut pro praesenti haberi possit,' Hand Tursellin. iii. p. 643 ; and for the position of modo before quam Cic. Phil. xiv. 22 Supplicationem modo qui decreuit; or, as Canneg. thought, with the imper. exue, 'just,' dismissing the wolt's suggestion with some contempt, as in i modo tace modo age modo uide modo caue modo; cf. Vergil's Necte Amarylli modo Ecl. viii. 79. exue. I again follow Lachm. in preferring this to exime of all the early MSS. It is true that eximere is often joined with curam metum and corresponding words (Hor. C. iii. I4. 13, 14, Epp. i. 5. 18, Cic. Tusc. Disp. ii. 12.29), but in the sense of withdrawing cares from others : on the other hand exue = 'drop' from your own mind; and this is obviously Av.'s meaning. So Mart. x. 30. 3, Ovid M. i. 622. 12. uiles, 'paltry.' minas, 'forebodings,' 'praedictiones malorum,' Wopkens, quoting Verg. Aen. iii. 540 Bello armantur equi, bellum baec armenta minantur. 13. sat erit, 'I shall be content,' is not to be changed to the weak satius, but stands in the same relation to Quam as Proderit in XXXVI. 15. Vergil G. i. 68 and Columella R. R. vi. 3.6 sat erit pondo quadragena singulis dari, vi. 5. 3 portione aequa per triduum cum uino dedisse sat erit use the words in a sense like the medical use of sat, satis est in prescriptions (Celsus passim) ; and there may be this under-notion here: the kid's perfect cure for the threatened but unreal danger of sacrifice is the thought of the real danger from the wolf's jaws. sacrum, 'sacrificial.' Catull. Ixviii. 75 sanguine sacro, Verg. Aen. v. 333 sacro cruore. 14-16. The Old English translation of Avianus is worth quoting here. 'I had rather to shed all my blood for the love of the gods, and to be sacrificed to them, than to be eaten and devoured of thee. And therefore he is full of wisdome and prudence, who of two great evills, may escape the greatest of both.' 14. Quam with no magis potius or similar word preceding has parallels in law language, as well as in classical writers generally. Roby, Introd. to Justinian, ccxviii. Dräger, Hist. Synt. ii. p. 618.

EXCURSUS I.

Praesumere.

Though the sense of 'anticipating' can alone claim to be classical, as early as Tacitus praesumere was already on its way to the later meaning of 'presuming,' 'arrogating,' which it still retains from the writers of the fourth, fifth, and subsequent centuries. Thus in Hist. i. 62 Torpebat Vitellius et fortunam principatus inerti luxu ac prodigis epulis praesumebat the meaning 'anticipated his imperial fortune' is not far removed from 'presumed upon.' Tertullian seems to be the earliest writer who distinctly used it in this later sense. De Cultu Feminarum ii. 2 Qui praesumit, minus ueretur, minus praecauet, plus periclitatur. Possibly it was an Africanism. In the time of Constantine it was quite common, and except in elaborate poetry seems almost to have banished the more correct use. Inc. Paneg. Constantin. (ix Bährens) ii Tene imperator tantum animo potuisse praesumere ut bellum tantis opibus, tanto consensu auaritiae, tanta scelerum contagione, tanta zeniae desperatione conflatum, quiescentibus cunctantibusque tunc imperii tui sociis primus inuaderes? Inc. Paneg. Maximian. et Constantin. vii Hoc iam tum diuina mente praesumpseras. Porfirius Optatianus x. 10 ed. L. Müller Ludere fas nobis, praesumere, dicere metra, where the editor notes 'praesumere audere, ex more deterioris aetatis.' It does not seem to occur in Ausonius or Prudentius: but their contemporaries Symmachus and Pacatus both employ it, the former frequently. Symm. Epp.iv. 36 Praesumptum de te officium operi meo uindicaui, 'the courtesy which I had counted upon,' viz. of writing to me. vii. 47 securitatis de tua mente praesumptae, 'the secure feeling I assumed as to your disposition.' Pacat. Paneg. Theodos. xlii Si nec praesumere ueniam reus, nec sperare fugam clausus, nec mortem potuit timere moriturus. It is not avoided by the careful writer Vegetius in his treatise De Re Militari iv. 44 Lang qui de uirtute praesumunt; but no instance is found in Claudian, who introduces the word once, in its classical sense of anticipating, de iv Cons. Honorii 165 sqq. Saepe tuas etiam iam tum gaudente marito Velauit regina comas, festinaque uoti Praesumptum diadema tulit, a passage very like that above cited from the Histories of Tacitus. After $400 \mathrm{~A} . \mathrm{D}$. it is of very frequent occurrence, e.g. in Salvianus De Gubernatione Dei and Ennodius' Letters. Salv. de G. D. iii. I Pauly recte etiam a nobis incolumitas aedificii praesumitur, cuius status subsidiis immortalibus continetur. Ennod. Epp. v. 8 Hartel quantum pruesumo, nec fides in diligentia nec ad unguem ductus sermo uos deserit in loquela. Libell. pro Synodo Praef. (p. 288 Hartel) animus babendi cupidine subiugatus praesumptum aestimat iam babere conpendiun, 'the gain it counts upon getting.' Vit. Epiphani (p. 371 H.) Audi Italorum supplicum uoces et de te praesumentium preces serenus admitte, 'of those who count on your help.' Dictio iv. p. 436 nee praesumimus aliquid nec timemus. On the other hand, it is remarkable that Ennodius in one of his poems introduces praesumere in its strictly classical sense. De Castitate p. ${ }^{40+}$ Ad me currentes puerum seponite factis (put aside the boy $=$ boyish habits), Deque meo, iutuenes, canam praesumite uitam, anticipate by carly sobriety the life of old men. The general elevation of Avianus' style inclines me to believe that he uses praesumptus in V. io similarly in a sense if not classical (see Commentary) at least short of that chamed for the passage by Barth, Wopkens, and Unrein.

EXCURSUS II¹.

Coniecturae Babrianae.

XII. 16, 17 , Rutherford:

XVIII. 3:

The following passage from Amm. Marcellinus is not noticed by Rutherford. xvi. 5. 5 Ex tapete et oıбúpa quam uulgaris simplicitas susurnam appellat.

It seems possible that ioias is a mistake for $\dot{\eta} \mu \dot{\epsilon}$ pas, the tame goats. He against the Babrian rules of rhythm. It would be better to retain $\beta \lambda$ є́тоьто as a passive, and reading $\tau 0 \hat{v} \pi \epsilon \in \lambda a s$, make the genitive depend on the substantival notion contained in $\tau i$ ßovicuor, 'that so might be seen in one's neighbour, what he was purposing ' $=$ ' one's neighbour's intention.'

Rutherford seems right in supplying a negative to $\epsilon \quad \gamma \epsilon \nu \nu i j \theta \eta \nu$; but I would then recast the verse as follows:

I do not believe Babrius could have admitted so faulty a rhythm as oúk ' $\pi^{\prime}$ є゙тоs є́ $\gamma \epsilon \nu \nu \eta \eta^{\prime} \theta \eta \nu$.
 Qvpaivet is an obvious correction.
XCIX. 2, 3: $\quad \chi \dot{\omega}$ 入́ $\epsilon \nu \tau i ́ \kappa \omega \lambda \nu \in \epsilon$;

 siders this conjecture certain. I should much prefer, taking a feather from his own wing, to write
'But won't you give your two quill-feathers as a pledge of your fidelity ?'
CLXXII, Gitlbauer ( 137 Eberhard) :
I would write this fable as follows:

[^0]:    ${ }^{1}$ Lachmann's critical editions of Babrius and Avianus appeared in 1845 .

[^1]:    1 This is much more remarkable when we remember that Symmachus, a pagan of the most pronounced type is, like Claudian, not unfrequently quoted by the Girammarians, c. g. iv. p. 488 Keil, v. 588 twice, vii. $45 \mathrm{~S}, 4 \mathrm{~S} 9$. The author of the short treatise De Dubiis Nominibus (Keil v. 588) quotes Symmachus with Prudentius, Sidonius, Ausonius, Iuvencus, Paulinus, Lactantius, Dynamius, Sedulius, Ambrosius, Avitus, Cyprianus, Fortunatus, Claudianus. Probably Symmachus was treated as a classic from the connexion of his memory with Prudentius, who while combating his anti-Christian views culogises his learning and eloquence.

[^2]:    ${ }^{1}$ Ausonius is equally flattering to Gratian as a verse-writer Epigr. i. II I 7 . Gratian wrote on the battle of Achilles with the Amazons. Ausonius says Exulta, Aeacide, celebraris uate superbo Rursum Romanusque tibi contingit Homerus.

[^3]:    ${ }^{2}$ Pacatus in his elaborate panegyric of Theodosius says nothing of his literary tendencies.

[^4]:    ${ }^{1}$ Fröhner now (I886) inclines to think the Preface of the Fables was based on the preface which Marcellus Empiricus has affixed to his work De Medicamentis, Marcellus is there called 'uir ill. ex mag. off. Theodosii sen.,' and 'Teuffel concludes that he wrote under Theodosius II. But I own that I fail to detect any sufficient resemblance in the two prefaces to justify an hypothesis framed on the comparison.
    ${ }^{2}$ Paris 637 I gives the subscription thus at the end of the first book of the Com= mentary on the Somnium Scipionis. AVr, MEMM. Symmachvs. VC Emendabam

[^5]:    ${ }^{1}$ Prudentius Perist. v. I7-20 might seem to allude to Av. XLII Ac uerba primum mollia Suadindo blande effuderat, Captator ut witulum lupus Rapturus adludit prius. Even more distinct is Perist. x. IIO4, 5 Aliter silere nescit oris garruli Vox inquieta quam tubam si fregero, cf. Av. XXXIX.

[^6]:    ${ }^{1}$ The reading of the Ilias Latina 901, 2 Occurritque uiro, sed non cum uiribus aequis, Acacidac nec compar crat is doubtful: the MSS give corpus, though one of Wernsdorf's Wolfenbuittel MSS has compar written over, and C. Barth, no light authority, thought the poet wrote compăr. The date of the Ilias Latina is assigned by Lachmann and L. Mïller to the age of Nero, by Buicheler, who thought Silius ltalicus wrote it, to the beginning of the sccond century.

[^7]:    ${ }^{1}$ Here we seem to have a relic of the Ennian original-
    Crastino seges
    Non metetur, neque necessumst hodie uti uos auferam.

[^8]:    ${ }^{1}$ It is noteworthy that the Brit. Mus. Xirith century MS of Avianns 21, 213 has Insignem for Ingentem in XXXI. I. Possibly a v.l. Insignem was transferred from the margin of XXX. 8 to XXXI. I.

[^9]:

[^10]:    ${ }^{1}$ I have attempted to restore this to Babrian scazons in Excursus II.

[^11]:    ATi The Delegates of the Press invite suggestions and advice from all persons interested in cducation: and will be thankful for hints, ©oc. addressed to the Secretary to the Delegates, Clarendon Press, Oxford.
